SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

FRIDAY, MAY 26, 1933

(Legislative day of Monday, May 15, 1933)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 1767. An act to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States, and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego; and

H.R. 4812. An act to promote the foreign trade of the United States in apples and/or pears, to protect the reputation of American-grown apples and pears in foreign markets, to prevent deception or misrepresentation as to the quality of such products moving in foreign commerce, to provide for the commercial inspection of such products entering such commerce, and for other purposes.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal for the calendar days of May 22, 23, 24, and 25 was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. DILL obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether the Senator from Washington is going to suggest the absence of a quorum. I have a privileged matter which I desire to present.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator desires a quorum, I shall be glad to make the point of no quorum, and I make that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Costigan	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	King	Russell
Bachman	Dale	La Follette	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	Lewis	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dieterich	Logan	Shipstead
Barbour	Dill	Lonergan	Smith
Barkley	Duffy	Long	Steiwer
Black	Erickson	McAdoo	Stephens
Bone	Fletcher	McCarran	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Utah
Bratton	George	McKellar	Townsend
Brown	Glass	McNary	Trammell
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	Murphy	Vandenberg
Byrd	Hale	Neely	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Harrison	Norris	Wagner
Capper	Hastings	Nye	Walsh
Caraway	Hatfield	Overton	Wheeler
Carey	Hayden	Patterson	White
Clark	Hebert	Pope
Connally	Johnson	Reed
Coolidge	Kean	Reynolds

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] is detained from the Chamber because of a temporary indisposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SENATOR FROM NEBRASKA

Mr. NORRIS. I present, Mr. President, the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON, appointed by the Governor of Nebraska as a Senator from Nebraska to fill the vacancy caused by the death of my late colleague.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Know all men by these presents:

That, whereas a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the State of Nebraska in the Senate of the United States by the death of the late Honorable R. B. Howell; and

Whereas WILLIAM H. THOMPSON is a suitable person to fill such vacancy and possesses the qualifications necessary for Senator:

Now, therefore, I, Charles W. Bryan, Governor of the State of Nebraska, do hereby appoint the said WILLIAM H. THOMPSON, of Grand Island, Nebr., to fill said vacancy and to do and perform all the duties of said office of United States Senator, this appointment to take effect on and after May 24, 1933, and to continue until the next regular election of State officers and until a successor is elected and qualified.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State.

Done at Lincoln this 24th day of May A.D. 1933.

CHARLES W. BRYAN.

By the Governor:

[SEAL]

HARRY R. SWANSON,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, Mr. THOMPSON is present in the Chamber, and I ask that the oath of office may be administered to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator designate will come forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. THOMPSON, escorted by Mr. NORRIS, advanced to the Vice President's desk; and the oath having been administered to him by the Vice President, he took his seat in the Senate.

MEMORANDUM OPINIONS FILED IN THE LOUDERBACK IMPEACHMENT CASE

Pursuant to the order entered on the calendar day of May 24, 1933, allowing each Senator 2 days after the final vote on the articles of impeachment against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, within which to file his individual opinion, the following opinions by Mr. BAILEY and Mr. THOMAS of Utah, respectively, were filed and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

OPINION FILED BY SENATOR BAILEY

In this proceeding, I conceive that Senators are divested, for its purposes, of their character of Senators and become jurors as to the evidence, its probative force or weight, and judges as to procedure, the admissibility of evidence, and as to the law. We are judges and jurors in this trial, not Senators. We are not representatives either of our States or the Union. We take a new oath and assume a new relationship. No personal or political consideration may be entertained. We are the constitutional triers of the impeachment proceeding—no more, no less.

Whether or not the proceeding of impeachment is of a criminal or civil character is a debated question. It is conceivable as probably partaking of both. The respondent is accused in the articles of impeachment of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and his removal upon conviction, notwithstanding his constitutional life tenure, for these causes is demanded. But his life tenure, however, is conditioned upon "good behavior", and the want of good behavior is not necessarily criminal. A judge might be held worthy of impeachment and removed from office for want of good behavior, notwithstanding he had committed neither "high crimes nor misdemeanors in office." The demand of "good behavior" is affirmative, not negative. It is not enough that a judge of a United States court should not have committed high crimes and misdemeanors in office, but he is held affirmatively to the duty of "good behavior."

It is quite within reason that the Constitution contemplates and the proceeding is predicated upon the view that the mere want of good behavior in one occupying a position so important and exalted, is itself in the nature of high crime and misdemeanor—not precisely in the generally accepted sense but not less really in a descriptive sense, and not less in the sense of the Government's demand upon those who occupy high office. Certainly the want of good behavior on the part of a judge is an offense against the Government, which looks to him not only to administer justice, but so to administer it and so to conduct himself that its people's sense of their own security and their trust in their Government may not be impaired—the rather may be augmented. For it is the duty of the public servant always to augment the popular confidence in the Government—its justice, its capacity for security, and in its disposition to serve the ends for which it was formed and in pursuit of which it must exist.

What has been said in the foregoing indicates the import of "good behavior." It is such a course of conduct as a judge as will not impair respect for and confidence in the office and the Government of which it is a manifestation. Affirmatively it is such behavior as is good. And the word "good" is a word of rare and emphatic import. To be good is more than to be right or correct or kind; one may be neither right, correct, nor kind, and yet be good. It carries the substantial sense of integrity—of wholeness of purpose. It is not that a judge shall be learned or great, not that he shall be of a judicial temperament; he must be a man of good behavior in the conduct of his office. This is the sole and significant condition of his tenure.

The question here is simply the question whether the evidence shows, to the satisfaction of two thirds of the jurors present, that the behavior of the judge in his office—and in a very significant sense the office and the man are inseparable—has been good; whether there is evidence satisfying us that his conduct in office has been such as to maintain the confidence of the people in the court, in him as the court, in his purpose to do justice. If he has not been of good behavior, that being the condition of his tenure, we may find against him and remove him.

This, it is true, interprets the terms "good behavior" and "high crimes and misdemeanors in office", with great emphasis upon "good behavior." It interprets "high crimes and misdemeanors" in terms of "good behavior." It is not conceivable that we should countenance less in a judge or any high servant of the Government. This interpretation demands much of judges; but they could not have been appointed upon less high considerations, and they hold their offices for life only upon the express condition of good behavior.

It is my view that the evidence here is not sufficient to justify a verdict adverse to the respondent. The presumption of innocence attends him. He was duly appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. His character and other qualifications were tested then. He was adjudged by the President and Senate to be fit. He has served 8 years. What has been shown here to rebut this presumption?

We have a veritable mass of matter admitted as evidence. It fills large volumes. It will be admitted by those who have examined it that at least three fourths of it is of no probative value whatever, and that the larger portion of it is irrelevant and immaterial. It was necessarily disregarded by counsel on either side for the most part; and some day the investigator may comment on the patience and the wastefulness of a court that took the time to hear it and put the public to the expense to pay for the printing of it. The evidence having legitimate claim to consideration might readily have been produced in 2 days, and with more effect.

There is testimony tending to raise suspicion in more than one instance; but impeachments are not to be tried upon suspicion. It is rather the duty of a juror in any case, where there are evidences of a bad import, to weigh them in view of the presumption of innocence; and it is not only a sound rule of law, but also of morals, where evidence is susceptible of reconciliation with innocence, notwithstanding it may be given an import otherwise, to prefer the reconciliation with innocence. We cannot assemble a collection of suspicious evidence and therefrom draw a conclusion of guilt. In this case, every item of testimony tending to create or suggest suspicion was frankly met by the respondent, and in each instance his testimony, if believed, was sufficient to allay the suspicion. His testimony, making due allowance for interest, is as worthy of belief as that of those who testified against him, and perhaps more so.

Moreover, in most instances it was clear that the witnesses were not without bias. Some of them, indeed the principal witnesses, had been personally disappointed in the orders of the court. In the matter of the first article, which was dwelt upon at great length, it appeared that the respondent had removed a receiver who had refused to appoint an attorney of the court's selection and had chosen to appoint as attorney one who represented the same interest that the receiver represented. The court was imposed upon in the appointment of the receiver. It was then further proposed to impose upon him. In removing the receiver under the circumstances the respondent did his duty—no less. Courts must control their receivers and their attorneys. Their power to do so may be questioned only in most unusual circumstances. The witnesses here were the victims of respondent's just conduct, of which they should not have complained.

It seems to me that the action of the court in this matter is the root of this proceeding, and that we would never have heard of it had the court failed to do its manifest duty and remove the receiver. All the complaint about fees and allowances, all the suspicions grouped about Mr. Leake, took their origin here. The complaint is rather that the receiver and his attorneys did not get the fees, than that the fees were too high. It is unnecessary to say that a removed receiver is a very questionable witness in such a matter.

Judges ought not to be drawn into an impeachment by such witnesses; and they ought to have assurance from the Senate that their action in removing receivers or refusing to permit them to select their attorneys, will not expose them to impeachment, without evidence of fraud or corruption. The judicial branch of the Government is not less important than the legislative or executive. They are regarded as equal as well as separate. The preservation of the independence of the judiciary is of the utmost importance, being of the essence of our system.

I hope that this unfortunate instance will serve rather to discourage impeachments founded upon such testimony from such witnesses than to encourage them. If Federal judges are to be called to account and threatened with disgrace because they remove receivers or refuse to let receivers select their own attorneys, we may prepare for very serious consequences. The Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, is not a tribunal for the review of the exercise of judicial discretion at the will of disappointed receivers or candidates for appointment as attorneys in receivership and bankruptcy cases. It is not a court of review under any circumstances. It is a court of inquiry.

That such men may gather up a variety of accusations and produce instances calculated to arouse suspicion against any judge or any man is a matter of common observation. That in this instance they failed to produce more against a judge whose services extend over 8 years rather tends to his credit. There are few of us against whom animus may not raise as much—if allowed.

As a manifestation of the character of this proceeding, we have but to read the record to perceive that it centers upon the respondent's dismissal of a receiver, his allowance of fees, his association with a friend, and his residence in a hotel without registration, and an error in a decree. These do not of themselves fall below the standard of good behavior.

The respondent's residence in the hotel was no secret. Registration is not required except for the hotel bookkeeping account. Residents of hotels are not expected to register, the registration being for transients. But it is said that the respondent changed his residence in order to change the venue of an anticipated action. His denial and explanation were quite sufficient.

The fees and allowances are alleged to have been exorbitant, and there is insinuation that there was with respect to them corruption by means of Mr. Leake. The fees and allowances may or may not have been high or too high. But certainly nothing was produced to justify the conclusion. We cannot undertake to review every large fee or allowance. Nor may we sustain impeachments founded on the exercise of judicial discretion, in the absence of evidence of corruption, fraud, or oppression. Here we have none of a substantial character. The friendly association of Mr. Leake was brought into the case with the view to suggestion of corruption. But nothing was shown beyond the usual incidents of friendship. It is true, considerable sums deposited to the credit of Mr. Leake were not explained. But it was not respondent's duty to explain them. The respondent had perfect right to associate with Mr. Leake, to live in a room in his apartments, and not be held to account for Mr. Leake's conduct or finances. If Mr. Leake was a man of bad character, it was the duty of the managers to show it. They did not do so. His character was not impeached.

It is admitted that respondent attached a condition to a decree which he had no power to attach. But respondent explained this. And he had the error corrected by stipulation. The Court of Impeachment does not review errors of law. Judges are not presumed to be infallible, nor is infallibility implied in good behavior. The higher courts are open for the correction of error.

The final article of the articles of impeachment, in my judgment, ought not to have been considered. It was a summary of the four preceding articles, a sort of catchall designed to collect all the votes of "guilty" on the preceding four articles, and so by accumulation to gather two thirds of the Senate to sustain the impeachment, which could not be sustained on any of the articles or on all four considered separately. In other words, two thirds of the Senate might have voted "not guilty" on each of the four articles, as was done—these containing the entire case—and yet two thirds might have voted "guilty" on the fifth article, which was no stronger than the four upon which he had been found not guilty, which fortunately did not happen. This course is prejudiced, and it is to be hoped that it will not be repeated. A respondent ought to be tried upon the articles, and, if acquitted on each, he ought not to be convicted on all of them assembled in one article.

In this proceeding the effect of this method is made manifest. A majority of the Senate declared him "not guilty" on each of the four specific articles, but on the fifth, which was only a collection of the four, a majority declared him "guilty." Whereas some voted guilty on one article and not guilty on others, it appears that all who voted guilty on any article were combined by the fifth. This unsound procedure ought not to be countenanced.

The Senate's power to try impeachments is predicated not only upon protection of the courts, the Government, and the people, but also upon the capacity of the Senate to do justice to respondents.

It is not intended to give us control over the judiciary, but only in proper cases to inquire, upon specific articles presented, into accusations sufficiently framed and sufficiently founded to justify trial of a public servant as to whether his conduct has disqualified him for the trust reposed in him. It must be so exercised as to avoid any appearance of effort to control the judiciary so as affirmatively to avoid the impression of supervision or control of the judiciary branch of the Government.

In such a trial, since the penalty, actual and moral, is very great, it is a Senator's duty to be at least as fair of mind as a petty juror and as indifferent as a judge. He can consider only the evidence, and whatever he finds he must find upon the evidence and by at least its greater weight. He must not tolerate suggestions from his fellow jurors. Whether he must be satisfied of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt in order to render a verdict of guilty is a debated question. But assuredly he must be satisfied of guilt by the greater weight of the evidence; otherwise he must vote "not guilty." The burden of proof is upon those who maintain the proceeding, and the only source of a verdict of guilty must be the evidence and its probative force in satisfying the judgment of the juror. Any other rule would destroy the independence of the judiciary and place judges at the mercy of the Senate.

JOSIAH W. BAILEY.

OPINION FILED BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

A fundamental purpose of our governmental scheme as set out in the preamble of the Constitution is "to establish justice." This is a right inherent in government itself. The establishment of justice considered as a primary purpose of government may be interpreted in two ways. The first is narrowly and formatively, through the establishment of courts and the development of the judicial branch of our Government along organic lines. The second is the broader, and relates to the administration of justice, and refers to ideals of justice and their maintenance. In this broad sense the expression "to establish justice" takes on a new meaning, far more comprehensive than the strictly legal aspects, and includes the moral, ethical, social, and behavioristic attributes.

It is a common concept of constitutional government that justice should be established through the medium of law and the interpretation and enforcement of law, that rights of persons and States are best maintained through a government of law. It must, therefore, logically follow that those individuals who interpret the law and thereby dispense justice must, of necessity, be men of the highest character if our people are to have faith in their Government and in their Government's administration of justice. It is the sacred duty of a member of the bar thus chosen to such high calling at all times to keep his name and his character inviolate.

That the position of judge of the United States courts was assumed by the framers of our Constitution to require a man of the highest character must be implied from the fact that judges are appointed to "hold their offices during good behavior." This, of course, means a life term during "good behavior." Life tenure of office restricted solely by competency and good behavior is denied all persons in the executive branch of our Government. It is denied all persons in the legislative branch of our Government. Therefore the Constitution not only implies that Federal judges should be of the highest character but, in granting them unlimited tenure during good behavior, it singles them out distinctly as a class of public servants who must and shall scrupulously keep their acts above reproach. Judges may be removed only through recourse to impeachment. This provision itself emphasizes the comparatively high importance which our Constitution places upon the judicial branch. A judge, therefore, must in reality be a paragon of official virtue. His life should be moral, his acts ethical, and his demeanor irreproachable. Singled out as one given position during "good behavior", a judge is definitely a marked person. His actions should be above the average actions of members of the legislative and executive branches of our Government. All American traditions of respect for our Federal courts support this conclusion. A judge is even protected by a limitation put upon the verdict after impeachment. Impeachment merely removes him from office and disqualifies him from holding further office.

In this spirit my votes in the impeachment trial are based upon the spirit of the constitutional provision, "good behavior", rather than the spirit of "high crimes and misdemeanors." This may be interpreted as seeking a level of behavior that is too high, but the lives and the actions of the judges and justices who are responsible for the high place of our Federal courts support this stand. The best ideals and the best traditions of our constitutional judicial system also support this stand.

ELBERT D. THOMAS.

BANKING REGULATIONS—MEMORANDUM ON VANDENBERG AMENDMENT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on yesterday when the Senate adopted my amendment to the banking bill, with the approval of the Banking and Currency Committee, I did not speak at length upon the amendment because I shared the anxiety of the able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] for speediest possible action. I refer to my amendment providing an immediate bank-deposit insurance formula applicable alike to member and nonmember banks in the Federal Reserve System. I proceeded upon the theory that the proposition is amply known to all Senators.

But certain comments and deductions which I believe to have been entirely erroneous were injected into the debate, and these misconstructions promptly crept into certain public prints. I refer to the mistaken notion that there is any sound analogy between the emergency insurance formula embraced within my amendment and previous failures of totally different State guaranty experiments. I refer also to the mistaken notion that there is anything inimical to State banks in my amendment; the fact being exactly contrary, namely, that one purpose of my amendment has been to protect State banks.

The whole proposition is desperately important not only to millions of bank depositors who have a right to a new deposit safety, but also to the fundamental economic recuperation of the Nation. It is too important to be left to the hazard of prejudice. At least it must have the benefit of every favorable consideration. It is particularly necessary that the conference between the House and the Senate, where the final fate of the amendment will be determined, should be fully advised.

Therefore, for the benefit of the conference and for the information of the country I have prepared an explanatory memorandum which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee of conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee of conference, as follows:

The purpose of the so-called "Vandenberg amendment" is to provide an immediate limited bank-deposit insurance for solvent banks, regardless of whether they are in the Federal Reserve System or not.

The permanent deposit-insurance structure provided in the new bank bill as reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency does not become effective until July 1, 1934, and then only in respect to member banks in the Federal Reserve System.

The theory of the Vandenberg amendment is: (1) That the primary need of the moment is immediate Federal protection for bank deposits, so that mass confidence may be immediately restored; (2) that we dare not wait 1 year before thus effectually combating the continued seepage of bank deposits and the continued and progressive hoarding; (3) that we must have immediate relief and that this relief must be extended alike to Federal Reserve banks licensed by the Treasury and to nonmember State banks which are licensed by their own State authorities and certified as solvent in respect to their deposits; (4) that there must be adequate provision for this immediate insurance on a safe and appropriate basis pending the time when the permanent structure shall become effective on July 1, 1934; (5) that the experience gained by the operation of this temporary insurance formula during the ensuing year will provide Congress with a body of experience which will permit it to intelligently remodel the permanent structure before it actually becomes effective in the next session of the Congress, if deemed advisable.

The special subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee unanimously approved the Vandenberg amendment. This subcommittee consisted of Senators GLASS, BULKLEY, MCADOO, WALCOTT, and TOWNSEND. The Senate approved the amendment on May 25. It is now in conference between the two Houses.

It has been urged that the amendment should be rejected because previous State guaranty schemes have been a failure. It is respectfully submitted that there is no analogy between this formula and these admitted State failures. In the first place, these State guaranties were confined to relatively localized sections of the country, and thus violated the primary insurance tenet that risks must be decentralized and sufficiently spread so as to avoid concentrated losses. Federal insurance, embraced in the Vandenberg amendment, is Nation-wide and avoids this indicated hazard. In the second place, these State guaranties had to collect all of their extraordinary revenues, in the event of extraordinary loss, by immediate assessments on member banks, because the credit of the State could not fund the loss. Federal insurance, embraced in the Vandenberg amendment, avoids this hazard: (a) Because the Federal credit is sufficiently powerful to pay concentrated losses and reimburse itself through reasonable subsequent assessments spread over the subsequent years; (b) because these subsequent assessments, if necessary, are restricted within entirely rational and livable limits. In the third place, these State guaranties failed because they covered all deposits, thus putting all banking on a dead level. The Vandenberg amendment applies only to deposits up to $2,500. According to best available estimates, these deposits will not exceed 25 percent of the total deposits. Therefore, bankers and depositors are left responsible for 75 percent of their deposits; and there remains no analogy whatever between the State guaranty failures and this proposed Federal insurance innovation.

It should be said in this connection that the protection of deposits up to $2,500 provides comparable protection to the limits of deposit in the Postal Savings System. Thus it meets Postal Savings competition. It covers the typical deposits, whether savings or commercial, of the typical average citizen. It protects bank deposits as represented by the great mass of depositors. Thus it fully meets the protective needs of the hour in that great group of our citizens among whom runs are generated, and among whom the greatest social tragedies occur when banks fail. It should end the possibility of bank runs. It should end mass hoarding, a perfectly understandable phenomenon, without the presence in the law of some such protection as is provided immediately by the Vandenberg amendment. It may be said to make the savings of America safe. Yet it does not go so far in respect to larger accounts as to relieve the bank and the depositor of responsibility for wise decisions. It strikes the happy medium, achieving depositor protection without involving an invitation to lax banking. Indeed, as Senator GLASS has well said, the cooperative phases of the entire deposit-insurance program are calculated to make banks and bankers more critical of each other than ever before, and thus to increase rather than diminish the inherent stimulus to wise and safe banking.

It was erroneously stated by one press association that the Vandenberg amendment is open to attack because it would "massacre thousands of State banks" by attempting to force them into the Federal Reserve System in order to be insured. Whether this criticism applies to the permanent insurance structure proposed in the main body of the bank bill, effective July 1, 1934, is a matter of argument. No such criticism can attach to the Vandenberg amendment, because the amendment specifically gets away from this alleged jeopardy, and one of its main objectives is thus to escape from any such jeopardy. The Vandenberg amendment opens this emergency insurance for the next year to "any State bank which is not a member of the Federal Reserve System but which is certified by the State's chief banking authority as solvent in respect to its unrestricted deposits."

As a result it is believed that this amendment will encourage and facilitate many reopenings of banks, including nonmember State banks, which are still closed. They can reopen by State license on a 100-percent basis or on a restricted basis. But so long as they are solvent in respect to that portion of their deposits which are unrestricted, these deposits can have the benefit of this immediate Federal insurance. The certificate of the State authority is the final and conclusive authority.

The blunt truth is that there continues to be persistent withdrawals from licensed banks. The trend is sufficiently obvious to discourage reopenings for other banks until the trend is checked. The trend must be checked. It cannot be allowed to run its disastrous course. It must be checked for the sake of banks that are open as well as for the sake of those that are yet to be reopened. It is the confirmed opinion of most authorities intimately in touch with the situation that nothing short of a basic Federal warrant behind deposits will suffice to stop the trend. Until solid and justified banking confidence is restored, all other contributions to the economic restoration are transient and ultimately futile. Inflated currency, if that be the reliance, is powerless to cope with deflated bank credit and bank-credit currency. We continue to suffer from the latter. The Vandenberg amendment is an immediate frontal attack upon it. Nothing less will succeed. If there be hazard in trying it, the hazard is nothing compared with a refusal to try it. Those who regard it as an evil must, upon mature reflection, regard it as the lesser of evils. To wait until 1934 for the application of this tonic may be to wait until the patient is dead. For example, as against those New Jersey bankers who have resolved against this idea, I respectfully commend the statement of Frank C. Ferguson, president of the Hudson County National Bank, of Jersey City. He says: "I am satisfied that the only thing that will reestablish public confidence in banks is some sort of guaranty. The public's confidence has been so shaken that the only thing that remains is its confidence in the Government." I could multiply that testimony 10,000 times. The fear of losses as a result of deposit insurance were best tempered with a frank assessment of what the larger losses may be without deposit insurance.

It is argued against the Vandenberg amendment that strong banks suffer for the sins of weak banks. The truth of the matter is that strong banks are right now jeopardized by weak banks. Strong banks do not escape this exposure by simply ignoring it. The menace is constant and is inherent in the common situation. One bank failure shatters banking confidence in the entire community. To save all solvent banks is as important to the strong as to those that are not so strong. This may prove to be a situation in which the chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Under this amendment the so-called "strong" bank is protected against the relative weakness of the less strong bank because the latter is immunized against mass runs which usually are as unjustified as they are fatal. Thus both the strong and the less strong are saved.

George E. Anderson, writing in the New York Herald Tribune of May 21, said that 27 percent of all our banking institutions are still closed; that this has locked up between $4,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000 of buying power; that "bank openings are essential to the United States plan"; that the "success of the Federal finance program depends on rehabilitation of these units." In other words, the weaker institutions ultimately govern the general situation to a substantial degree. Therefore the "strong banks" have a definite and specific stake in the fruits of the Vandenberg amendment.

Meanwhile the depositor has rights that are paramount to all others. I respectfully submit that it is untenable to argue that the only "safe banking" is banking at the risk and at the expense of the depositor. When those who oppose this deposit insurance refer to the "losses" incurred in the State insurance experiments, I am moved to inquire whether there have not been infinitely greater "losses" entirely outside and beyond these State insurance experiments. The difference is that without insurance, the "losses" fall upon the individual depositor. With insurance, the "losses" are assimilated by banking as an institution and, if necessary, by the Public Treasury as a matter of sound public policy. The "losses" are constant. It is just a question of who pays them, so far as this phase of the argument is concerned, and I respectfully submit that it is more tenable for Congress to insure these "losses" than to dump them upon the depositor who is in no sense responsible for what happens to his bank.

It is argued that the Vandenberg amendment may put a strain upon the public credit. A frank study of the fiscal probabilities denies this thesis. The Vandenberg amendment creates an insurance fund, under the management of the Federal Reserve Board, which gets its first contribution from the depositor himself. Banks cannot pay in excess of 2½ percent interest on insured deposits. This is usually one half of 1 percent less than normal. The depositor will be glad to buy absolute security throughout this next year at this cheap price. The bank remits one half of 1 percent on its insured deposits to the fund. Figuring the total bank deposits in the country to 40 billions and the deposits under $2,500 at 25 percent of the total, we shall have 10 billions of insured deposits. The initial fee will produce 50 million dollars. There can be one similar assessment of the same amount against the bank during the emergency year if required. This will produce another 50 millions. Meanwhile the Government has contributed an initial capital of 10 millions. Thus the normal revenue of the insurance fund for this emergency year will be 110 millions. If this is insufficient to pay the losses, the Federal treasury advances the balance so that there is no delay in paying the depositor. But it reimburses itself by a subsequent annual tax of one fourth of 1 percent per annum for as many years as necessary up to 10. This can ultimately produce another 250 millions. If there is still a deficit, it is paid by the Federal Treasury. But 360 millions must be first exhausted.

What are the prospective liabilities? The total deposits in all closed banks (members of the Federal Reserve and nonmembers) in the worst year ever suffered (last year) were approximately $1,500,000,000. If 25 percent of these deposits were under $2,500, the insured loss under the Vandenberg amendment would have been 375 millions. The average recovery on liquidation is between 55 percent and 60 percent. The former percentage would produce a recovery of 206 millions. Thus the net loss to the fund would have been 169 millions—or less than half of the total resources of the insurance fund before the fund would charge its final losses to the Treasury.

It is respectfully argued that there is no probability of anything like this recurrent record of closed banks. In the first place, the very fact that so much banking loss already has been assimilated means that the remaining hazard is proportionately reduced. In the second place, countless numbers of these closings were caused by needless runs born of mass suspicions which never would have occurred if deposit insurance had been in existence. In the third place, there is a new and worthy emphasis all over the land upon closer scrutiny of banking—upon better, safer banking—and public authority, whether National or State, is bound to be more vigilant than ever before. Meanwhile the very existence of this deposit insurance will reduce the exposure. It is inconceivable that the situation in 1933–34, covered by the Vandenberg amendment, can be as costly as in 1931–32. Yet it can be twice as costly under the available computations before the deposit insurance will involve the Treasury in a loss. But if finally there shall be a Treasury loss, it will be a far cheaper investment than to let the bank depositors of the Nation suffer a recurrence of their recent experiences. Again the wise man chooses the lesser of evils. The United States could not survive another deflationary experience in respect to bank deposits which would duplicate the experience of the last 18 months. The Vandenberg amendment is as conservative as any answer dares to be to this challenge. As a financial measure, it is indispensable. As a social and humanitarian measure, it is the price of progress and of social justice. It is fair to all depositors in all solvent banks, whether they be Federal Reserve members or nonmembers.

The country cannot afford to wait until July 1934 for this deposit insurance. It cannot afford to penalize nonmember State banks in the inception of an insurance formula. The bank bill is incomplete without this Vandenberg amendment. Its trial during the next emergency year will provide Congress with a laboratory experience in respect to deposit insurance. Congress then can determine next spring whether the permanent insurance structure, provided in the banking bill, is adequate and advisable. It can make whatever changes experience may recommend.

I submit the opinion of Dr. Warren M. Persons, prominent economist, whose view of contemporary needs was recently solicited by the Finance Committee of the Senate. I quote an Associated Press dispatch:

"As a preliminary to his plan or the adoption of any other plan for stopping continued deflation, Dr. Persons is of the opinion that it may be necessary to "take definite action for preventing runs on banks." In this respect he holds "it may be necessary for the Government and the banks to guarantee temporarily the deposits of those banks which are allowed to open."

I also submit the opinion of Thomas Nixon Carter, professor of political economy at Harvard University, as follows:

"Credit will not expand again until confidence is restored. Confidence will not return until people believe that their money is safe when in a bank or when invested. They will not have confidence in banks until the Government guarantees bank deposits. That is a drastic measure, but nothing short of that will do. * * * If the Government would do these two obviously right things—namely, guarantee bank deposits and subsidize gold production—it would not be necessary to do the many futile things they are now trying to do. The depression will end when we have a banking system in which depositors cannot lose their savings and when there is gold enough on the market to make it cheaper and the prices of other things higher in terms of gold."

I also submit a cogent editorial on this general subject from the Detroit News entitled "The Passage of This Act Is Vital." The editorial follows:

"President Roosevelt is said to be desirous that the special session of Congress end about June 1.

"We believe there is one measure whose passage would more than justify holding Congress in session beyond June 1, if more time is necessary to attain that object. The enactment of that bill would do more to restore public confidence and stimulate business than any other piece of legislation that could be devised. We refer to the bank-deposit guaranty which it is proposed to incorporate in the Glass banking bill.

"Banking is a highly technical business. All the average man knows about it is that in good times he put his money into the bank, without any qualms as to its security, and paid no attention whatever to what the bank did with it, as long as his withdrawal checks were honored. He knows little more about the technical side of banking today; he has learned, however, that banks in which he had complete confidence were pronounced sound one day and closed on the next, or within a very short time thereafter. That experience has shaken the faith of many people.

"The improvement in business during the past 2 months has been marked. Everybody hopes that the upward movement will continue until normal conditions have been reinstated. But banks still feel the need of maintaining extraordinary precautions to preserve a high state of liquidity. They are not making loans they would unquestionably make if they did not have to fear a sudden loss of confidence, which would cause an enormous demand on them for the immediate payment of deposits. Therefore business is retarded and new and promising ventures are held up indefinitely. Meanwhile millions of people are keeping their money in strong boxes and paying it out of pocket instead of entrusting it to the banks.

"The cure of this situation would come immediately by the guaranty of bank deposits. Money would flow from private hoards to the banks. There would be no runs, for even if a bank should fail the depositors would know they would be paid in full. Thus the guaranty would be a good thing for the depositors and a good thing for the banks as well.

"The whole question of bank security is now, we believe, psychological. After all the banks were closed those who could demonstrate their soundness were permitted to reopen. If the people still withhold their confidence, it is because they have received a scare so great than an extraordinary measure is needed to dissipate it. The guaranty of deposits would restore their confidence at once. Moreover, they are entitled to more from the Government than mere supervision of the banks in the Federal Reserve System. They are entitled to assurance that their money is safe, especially if they are willing—and who is not?—to pay the insignificant amount which would give them complete security.

"Congress should not adjourn until it has made this provision."

THE LATE THEODORE F. SHUEY

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial from the Evening Star on the character and public service of Theodore F. Shuey, late Official Reporter of this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, May 20, 1933]

THEODORE F. SHUEY

So much an institution that his friends considered him an almost permanent fixture in the Senate Chamber, Theodore F. Shuey nevertheless was a distinct personality, richly endowed with his own peculiar qualities of unpretending integrity and dignity. He was a quiet man, self-possessed, at once a proper trifle remote and detached, but always generously helpful. As an official reporter of debates, he was a shadow of the statesmanship of the upper House of the National Legislature. Never in his own capacity was he entitled to rise and speak. Instead, for 65 years he gave his time and energy to the preservation of other men's judgments, other men's opinions. In the truest sense of the phrase he wrote his country's annals during those six and a half decades, and not once, it is said, was his accuracy ever challenged.

The Senate reporters are a distinguished group of writers. That has been noticed on many occasions. But among them Mr. Shuey easily held first place. He was their dean, their father. They loved him, and the affection which they entertained was mirrored by the Senate personnel and by the press gallery and all those other newspaper people who, while not assigned to that post, are in more or less constant contact with it.

"The nimblest fingers and the quickest brain" were his possessions, the constituent elements of his genius. Even the most rapid and temperamentally exuberant speakers were not beyond his powers. When discussion reached its most violent apex, he would sit unperturbed in the center of the storm calmly recording every syllable of the oratorical tempest, and when Senators came to read over their utterances they sometimes marveled at their own ability, their own mastery of English, and their own forensic capacity, dimly conscious of the debt in which they stood to their stenographer. But it was part of his function to be unobtrusive, and he was incapable of presumption. He symbolized the good manners, the judgment, and the modesty, as well as the skill, of the group to which he belonged.

Mr. Shuey surely deserves mention in one of those footnotes to history which often enough are more interesting than the formal text. All the historians of the period between 1868 and the present year must be aware of their obligation to him. He was the beau ideal of a legislative amanuensis. Those who knew him well will miss him, those who knew him not at all will salute his memory with appreciation.

PROPOSED INCREASED GASOLINE TAX

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have received, as doubtless other Senators have received, an enormous number of telegrams regarding the proposed increase of the tax on gasoline. If I were to reply to these telegrams at public expense, it would exhaust the contingent fund of the Senate; and if I should reply at my own expense, it would exhaust the microscopically small contingent funds that I still possess. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a sample of the telegrams received on this subject, together with the names of the senders.

I trust that those of my constituents who read the RECORD will realize that it is impossible for me to reply to these hundreds of telegraphic dispatches that come daily, and I further trust that those of my constituents who telegraph to me will not deem it amiss in me or discourteous if I reply by sending the answer marked "collect."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the telegram, with the signatures, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TUCSON, ARIZ., May 26, 1933.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senator, Washington, D.C.:

We feel that proposed increase of Federal gasoline tax by three-fourths cent per gallon is entirely unjust and represents further imposition upon the motoring public. Therefore we appeal to you to vote against this unjust proposal.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Georgia-Florida Pecan Growers Association, in annual convention at Albany, Ga., favoring continuation of the activities of the Bureaus of Plant Industry, Entomology, Chemistry and Soils, and Agricultural Engineering at the Albany (Ga.) Pecan Research Laboratory and other laboratories in connection with the fostering and protection of the pecan industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Mrs. Betty W. Carter, of Hammond, La., praying for a continuation of the investigation of the senatorial election in Louisiana in 1932, and also an investigation relative to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Mrs. H. C. Homeyer, of Covington, La., praying for a senatorial investigation of alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by members of the Federation of Jewish Junicr Associations, Philadelphia, Pa., condemning and protesting against the treatment of and alleged outrages committed against members of the Jewish faith in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the thirty-seventh annual meeting of the General Court of the Order of the Founders and Patriots of America, at New York City, N.Y., protesting against recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, under its present communistic regime, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Forty-fourth Annual Congress of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, at Cincinnati, Ohio, protesting against the recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, and favoring the passage of legislation excluding alien communists from admission to the United States and providing for the expulsion of aliens who engage in communistic activities aimed at the overthrow of the Government or the destruction of political institutions by other than peaceful and constitutional methods, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the common council of the city of Worcester, Mass., favoring the passage of legislation providing for the issuance of special series of postage stamps commemorative of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the naturalization as an American citizen in 1783 and appointment as brevet brigadier general of Thaddeus Kosciusko, a hero of the Revolutionary War, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. KEAN presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Stephen K. Little, Mercer County chairman Young Republicans of New Jersey, Princeton, N.J., remonstrating against proposed increased income taxes and dividend tax, and favoring instead the imposition, if necessary, of a small manufacturers' sales tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Charles E. Wescott Post, No. 173, the American Legion, of Bath, N.Y., protesting against the passage of the bill (S. 583) relating to the classified Civil Service, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the World Trade League two-way trade dinner at New York City, N.Y., favoring the delegation to the President of full powers to negotiate and conclude reciprocal tariff agreements with foreign nations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Oelbaum Family Society, Inc., New York City, N.Y., protesting against the treatment of, and alleged outrages committed against, members of the Jewish faith in Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Naomi Council, No. 31, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, Suffern, N.Y., favoring the passage of the so-called " Dies bill ", providing a fixed quota for the admission of alien immigrants to the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS—MEMORIAL

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and lie on the table a memorial signed by a number of persons in the State of Indiana, protesting against the passage of Senate bill 1580, the pending railroad emergency relief bill.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

EVANSVILLE, IND., May 15, 1933.

HON. ARTHUR E. ROBINSON,
HON. FREDERICK VAN NUYS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Your petitioners, all of whom are engaged in the transportation industry in the city of Evansville and the State of Indiana, being fully cognizant of the provisions of Senate bill S. 1580, introduced May 4 by the honorable Mr. ROBINSON, of the Commonwealth of Arkansas, do hereby represent that such proposed legislation is not in the public interest, in that its adoption will retard economic recovery by throwing at least 100,000 of those now employed out of employment, and this number may eventually be doubled. Then, too, the proposed legislation will result in the abandonment of certain lines of railroads, terminals, and other facilities, which will seriously depreciate property values in communities where railroad facilities will be abandoned.

Your petitioners, the undersigned, therefore urgently request that you oppose passage of said bill in its present form, and further request that you support amendments to the bill which are introduced at the request of the railway labor executives' committee.

PROPOSED RECOGNITION OF SOVIET GOVERNMENT OF RUSSIA—THE RUSSIAN-POLISH SITUATION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask that there may be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State, to Louis A. Johnson, national commander of the American Legion, in opposition to the recognition by the United States of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. This letter was read at a mass meeting held in the Washington Auditorium April 18, 1933.

Also, I present and request to have printed in full in the RECORD a formal reply from Mr. Colby to the Ambassador of Italy as to the stand of the United States on the same matter in reference to the Russian-Polish situation. I ask that the communications be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the communications were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 15, 1933.

LOUIS A. JOHNSON, Esq.,
National Commander the American Legion,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR COMMANDER JOHNSON: For the reason here stated I reach with regret the decision that I should not take an active part in the great meeting to be held in Washington under the auspices of the American Legion to record the strong opposition which prevails in the United States to the recognition of the present Soviet regime.

You are doubtless aware that it devolved upon me during the administration of Woodrow Wilson to make the official declaration of this country's refusal to accord such recognition.

Having spoken officially, it has seemed the part of good taste, as well as correct procedure, to leave the further discussion of that policy to others.

I am, however, in complete sympathy with the purposes of your meeting, and believe the position of the organization which you have the honor to head is sound from every viewpoint and truly expresses the judgment of the American people.

As happens frequently to a controversial question, much has been said that is well calculated, if not intended, to confuse the issue. It is important that such confusion should be brushed aside and the real issue clearly understood.

The original refusal of the United States to recognize Russia had nothing to do with the acknowledgment or repudiation of its debt to this country.

It had nothing to do with the type of government Russia saw fit to adopt, its communism, or other theories of economic and social relations.

It was not prompted by any desire to influence the internal administration of Russia, or to express an opinion, either favorable or adverse, upon her institutions. This was expressly disclaimed by the United States.

It was on an entirely different ground that American recognition was denied. Our refusal was predicated upon the fact that Russia was an enemy state.

Despite denial and the concealments and disguises employed by as subtle a propaganda as the world has ever seen, this enmity continues to be the foundation of Soviet foreign policy. Its government is organically linked with and controlled by the Communist Internationale, whose central purpose is the fomenting of revolution in every non-Bolshevist state.

If this is the fact—and no responsible Russian dares disaffirm it—the tests established for recognition under normal conditions have no application.

It is entirely beside the point that the Government of Russia may be, as the propagandists for recognition maintain, a de facto government, able to impose its authority and maintain order, although by cruel repression, within its territorial confines.

To concede recognition as a friend to a nation that protests she is not a friend, but on the contrary is dedicated to the overthrow of our institutions and sworn to conspire against our peace and security is unthinkable—"a solemn lie," to use the words of Secretary of State Elihu Root. He was speaking at a dinner given in honor of Chief Justice Hughes on the completion of the latter's term as Secretary of State.

"He knew," said Mr. Root, referring to Secretary Hughes, "that the act of recognition would be a false pretense of accepting the obligations of the Bolshevik rulers of Russia to observe friendship to the Government and the people of the United States; that they did not intend friendship, but intended enmity and destruction to the Government of the United States and the institutions of the American people; and he knew that to recognize the Russian Government would be to open the doors to them to carry out their purpose of destructive enmity, and would be a stupid and idiotic yielding to mere momentary expediency in order to make future disaster certain."

It should be added at this point that Secretary of State Kellogg and Secretary of State Stimson, as well as Mr. Hughes, adhered undeviatingly to the policy of nonrecognition.

It is the basis of Russia's theory that our so-called "capitalist civilization" is incapable of solving in an evolutionary and constitutional way the problems which besiege it.

The world revolution, therefore, is assumed to be inevitable and the Russian revolution is looked upon by the present Russian leaders as a prelude to the overthrow of capitalist and democratic civilizations throughout the world.

Let a revolutionary situation develop in any country, especially in a country of strategic importance in the economic and political system of the world, and the resources of the Russian State, already pledged to its support, will be immediately placed behind the revolutionary forces.

As recently as January 10 of this year an Associated Press dispatch from Moscow, appearing in the New York Times, quoted Dictator Stalin as saying:

"Our own camp is being increased throughout the world by the successes of the 5-year plan. This means that proletarian revolutions are threatening the capitalist world and that these successes are mobilizing revolutionary forces of all countries against capitalism."

The progress of communism in the United States is continually remarked with satisfaction and boasting in the Government press of Russia. Credit is claimed by Moscow as the organizer and director of all movements of unrest in this country, such as the veterans' march on Washington, the disturbances among the Pennsylvania miners, the Scottsboro trial, and the agitation among our negro population against "white chauvinism", to use the expression current in Russia.

In a recent issue of Pravda, Stalin is quoted as having said:

"The Communist Internationale has created possibilities for the Communist Party in the United States to reach the stage where it is able to prepare the masses for the coming revolution."

Russia's present concentration upon her internal development and particularly the sacrifices which she is calling upon her oppressed people to endure, are explained by the desire to increase her power and make it more effective when this final—and from Russia's point of view inevitable—combat between capitalism and communism arrives.

The evidence on this point is inexhaustible. The proof is overwhelming.

I am gratified to think that these vital matters will be examined fully and methodically before the present administration allows its mind to crystallize on this subject.

The resolution recently introduced in the Senate by Senator KING calling upon the State Department for all the information in its possession bearing upon these matters is a step in the right direction. This information is doubtless complete and well arranged. It is indispensable to any rational approach to the question.

You will observe that I have not referred to the so-called "business argument" for recognition.

The contention that vast opportunities for profitable trade would be opened up if our policy of nonrecognition were abandoned has been used effectively by the Soviet Government.

The argument has little if any merit. The evidence is conclusive that our present policy has afforded ample facility for all the trade with Russia that is economically possible.

The unhappy experience of Great Britain and Italy, each of whom has decided to cancel its trade agreements with Russia, and the equally unsatisfactory experience of France, should silence the clamor of selfish traders who would barter American principles for commercial profit—and a dubious profit, at that.

Soviet foreign trade is a function of the Government. As such, it is absolutely subject to soviet policy. It is turned on or off like a tap, to serve soviet political ends. No nation has materially increased its trade with Russia as a result of recognition; nor has the United States suffered in the least by withholding it. The traders' argument has no place among the considerations which should actuate or deter the United States on this question.

As the late President Calvin Coolidge said, with his forceful directness:

"I do not propose to barter away for the privilege of trade any of the cherished rights of humanity; I do not propose to make merchandise of American principles."

There has been no alteration in the basic hostility of the Soviet regime to all non-Bolshevik governments. This fundamental enmity has always been, and still is, the central and basic fact of its philosophy and foreign policy.

At times it has suited Russia's purposes to deny this fact; at other times to conceal it, but never to abandon it. When conditions in any part of the world appear inviting or propitious it flares forth with intensity and malignity, as has been shown in China and more recently in Moscow's call to the German proletariat to rise in revolt, despite the technical friendliness of the diplomatic relations between Russia and Germany and the volume to which the strictly controlled trade of Russia with Germany has been allowed to expand for the time being by the Soviet Union.

In the light of known facts, it must be manifest to every unprejudiced mind that in all essential particulars the theory and practice of the Soviet regime remain precisely as they were when this country reached the decision that it could not recognize the present rulers of Russia as a government with which the relations common to friendly governments can be maintained.

Sincerely yours,

BAINBRIDGE COLBY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
August 10, 1920.

AMERICAN NOTE ON POLISH SITUATION—BEING A FORMAL REPLY FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO THE AMBASSADOR OF ITALY IN ANSWER TO THE AMBASSADOR'S INQUIRY AS TO THE POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES REGARDING THE RUSSIAN-POLISH SITUATION

His Excellency Baron CAMILLO ROMANO AVEZZANA,
Ambassador of Italy.

EXCELLENCY: The agreeable intimation, which you have conveyed to the State Department that the Italian Government would welcome a statement of the views of this Government on the situation presented by the Russian advance into Poland deserves a prompt response, and I will attempt without delay a definition of this Government's position not only as to the situation arising from Russian military pressure upon Poland but also as to certain cognate and inseparable phases of the Russian question viewed more broadly.

This Government believes in a united, free, and autonomous Polish state, and the people of the United States are earnestly solicitous for the maintenance of Poland's political independence and territorial integrity. From this attitude we will not depart, and the policy of this Government will be directed to the employment of all available means to render it effectual. The Government therefore takes no exception to the effort apparently being made in some quarters to arrange an armistice between Poland and Russia, but it would not, at least for the present, participate in any plan for the expansion of the armistice negotiations into a general European conference which would in all probability involve two results, from both of which this country strongly recoils, viz, the recognition of the Bolshevist regime and a settlement of Russian problems almost inevitably upon the basis of a dismemberment of Russia.

From the beginning of the Russian Revolution, in March 1917, to the present moment, the Government and the people of the United States have followed its development with friendly solicitude and with profound sympathy for the efforts of the Russian people to reconstruct their national life upon the broad basis of popular self-government. The Government of the United States, reflecting the spirit of its people, has at all times desired to help the Russian people. In that spirit all its relations with Russia, and with other nations in matters affecting the latter's interests, have been conceived and governed.

The Government of the United States was the first government to acknowledge the validity of the revolution and to give recognition to the provisional government of Russia. Almost immediately thereafter it became necessary for the United States to enter the war against Germany, and in that undertaking to become closely associated with the allied nations, including, of course, Russia. The war weariness of the masses of the Russian people was fully known to this Government and sympathetically comprehended. Prudence, self-interest, and loyalty to our associates made it desirable that we should give moral and material support to the provisional government, which was struggling to accomplish a twofold task, to carry on the war with vigor and, at the same time, to reorganize the life of the nation and establish a stable government based on popular sovereignty.

Quite independent of these motives, however, was the sincere friendship of the Government and the people of the United States for the great Russian Nation. The friendship manifested by Russia toward this Nation in a time of trial and distress has left with us an imperishable sense of gratitude. It was as a grateful friend that we sent to Russia an expert commission to aid in bringing about such a reorganization of the railroad transportation system of the country as would reinvigorate the whole of its economic life and so add to the well-being of the Russian people.

While deeply regretting the withdrawal of Russia from the war at a critical time and the disastrous surrender at Brest-Litovsk, the United States has fully understood that the people of Russia were in no wise responsible.

The United States maintains unimpaired its faith in the Russian people, in their high character and their future. That they will overcome the existing anarchy, suffering, and destitution we do not entertain the slightest doubt. The distressing character of Russia's transition has many historical parallels, and the United States is confident that restored, free, and united Russia will again take a leading place in the world, joining with the other free nations in upholding peace and orderly justice.

Until that time shall arrive the United States feels that friendship and honor require that Russia's interests must be generously protected, and that, as far as possible, all decisions of vital importance to it, and especially those concerning its sovereignty over the territory of the former Russian Empire be held in abeyance. By this feeling of friendship and honorable obligation to the great nation whose brave and heroic self-sacrifice contributed so much to the successful termination of the war, the Government of the United States was guided in its reply to the Lithuanian National Council on October 15, 1919, and in its persistent refusal to recognize the Baltic States as separate nations independent of Russia. The same spirit was manifested in the note of this Government of March 24, 1920, in which it was stated, with reference to certain proposed settlements in the Near East, that "no final decision should or can be made without the consent of Russia."

In line with these important declarations of policy, the United States withheld its approval from the decision of the supreme council at Paris recognizing the independence of the so-called "Republics" of Georgia and Azerbaijan, and so instructed its representative in southern Russia, Rear Admiral Newton A. McCully. Finally, while gladly giving recognition to the independence of Armenia, the Government of the United States has taken the position that the final determination of its boundaries must not be made without Russia's cooperation and agreement. Not only is Russia concerned because a considerable part of the territory of the new state of Armenia, when it shall be defined, formerly belonged to the Russian Empire; equally important is the fact that Armenia must have the good will and the protective friendship of Russia if it is to remain independent and free.

These illustrations show with what consistency the Government of the United States has been guided in its foreign policy by a loyal friendship for Russia. We are unwilling that while it is helpless in the grip of a nonrepresentative government, whose only sanction is brutal force, Russia shall be weakened still further by a policy of dismemberment, conceived in other than Russian interests.

With the desire of the Allied Powers to bring about a peaceful solution of the existing difficulties in Europe, this Government is, of course, in hearty accord, and will support any justifiable steps to that end. It is unable to perceive, however, that a recognition of the Soviet regime would promote, much less accomplish, this object, and it is therefore averse to any dealings with the Soviet regime beyond the most narrow boundaries to which a discussion of an armistice can be confined.

That the present rulers of Russia do not rule by the will or the consent of any considerable proportion of the Russian people is an incontestable fact. Although nearly 2½ years have passed since they seized the machinery of government, promising to protect the constituent assembly against alleged conspiracies against it, they have not yet permitted anything in the nature of a popular election. At the moment when the work of creating a popular representative government based upon universal suffrage was nearing completion the Bolsheviki, although, in number, an inconsiderable minority of the people, by force and cunning seized the powers and machinery of government and have continued to use them with savage oppression to maintain themselves in power.

Without any desire to interfere in the internal affairs of the Russian people, or to suggest what kind of government they should have, the Government of the United States does express the hope that they will soon find a way to set up a government representing their free will and purpose. When that time comes, the United States will consider the measures of practical assistance which can be taken to promote the restoration of Russia, provided Russia has not taken itself wholly out of the pale of the friendly interest of other nations by the pillage and oppression of the Poles.

It is not possible for the Government of the United States to recognize the present rulers of Russia as a government with which the relations common to friendly governments can be maintained. This conviction has nothing to do with any particular political or social structure which the Russian people themselves may see fit to embrace. It rests upon a wholly different set of facts. These facts, which none disputes, have convinced the Government of the United States, against its will, that the existing regime in Russia is based upon the negation of every principle of honor and good faith, and every usage and convention underlying the whole structure of international law; the negation, in short, of every principle upon which it is possible to base harmonious and trustful relations, whether of nations or of individuals. The responsible leaders of the regime have frequently and openly boasted that they are willing to sign agreements and undertakings with foreign powers while not having the slightest intention of observing such undertakings or carrying out such agreements. This attitude of disregard of obligations voluntarily entered into, they base upon the theory that no compact or agreement made with a non-Bolshevist government can have any moral force for them. They have not only avowed this as a doctrine but have exemplified it in practice. Indeed, upon numerous occasions the responsible spokesmen of this power, and its official agencies, have declared that it is their understanding that the very existence of Bolshevism in Russia, the maintenance of their own rule, depends, and must continue to depend, upon the occurrence of revolutions in all other great civilized nations, including the United States, which will overthrow and destroy their Governments and set up Bolshevist rule in their stead. They have made it quite plain that they intend to use every means, including, of course, diplomatic agencies, to promote such revolutionary movements in other countries.

It is true that they have in various ways expressed their willingness to give "assurances" and "guarantees" that they will not abuse the privileges and immunities of diplomatic agencies by using them for this purpose. In view of their own declarations, already referred to, such assurances and guaranties cannot be very seriously regarded. Moreover, it is within the knowledge of the Government of the United States that the Bolshevist Government is itself subject to the control of a political faction, with extensive international ramifications through the Third Internationale, and that this body, which is heavily subsidized by the Bolshevist Government from the public revenues of Russia, has for its openly avowed aim the promotion of Bolshevist revolutions throughout the world. The leaders of the Bolsheviki have boasted that their promises of noninterference with other nations would in no wise bind the agents of this body. There is no room for reasonable doubt that such agents would receive the support and protection of any diplomatic agencies the Bolsheviki might have in other countries. Inevitably, therefore, the diplomatic service of the Bolshevist Government would become a channel for intrigues and the propaganda of revolt against the institutions and laws of countries with whom it was at peace, which would be an abuse of friendship to which enlightened governments cannot subject themselves.

In the view of this Government there cannot be any common ground upon which it can stand with a power whose conceptions of international relations are so entirely alien to its own, so utterly repugnant to its moral sense. There can be no mutual confidence or trust, no respect even, if pledges are to be given and agreements made with a cynical repudiation of their obligations already in the mind of one of the parties. We cannot recognize, hold official relations with, or give friendly reception to the agents of a government which is determined and bound to conspire against our institutions; whose diplomats will be the agitators of dangerous revolt; whose spokesmen say that they sign agreements with no intention of keeping them.

To summarize the position of this Government I would say, therefore, in response to Your Excellency's inquiry, that it would regard with satisfaction a declaration by the Allied and Associated Powers that the territorial integrity and true boundaries of Russia shall be respected. These boundaries should properly include the whole of the former Russian Empire, with the exception of Finland proper, ethnic Poland, and such territory as may by agreement form a part of the Armenian State. The aspirations of these nations for independence are legitimate. Each was forcibly annexed and their liberation from oppressive alien rule involves no aggressions against Russia's territorial rights and has received the sanction of the public opinion of all free peoples.[1] Such a declaration presupposes the withdrawal of all foreign troops from the territory embraced by those boundaries and, in the opinion of this Government, should be accompanied by the announcement that no transgression by Poland, Finland, or any other power of the line so drawn and proclaimed will be permitted.

Thus only can the Bolshevist regime be deprived of its false but effective appeal to Russian nationalism and compelled to meet the inevitable challenge of reason and self-respect which the Russian people, secure from invasion and territorial violation, are sure to address to a social philosophy that degrades them and a tyranny that oppresses them.

The policy herein outlined will command the support of this Government.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

BAINBRIDGE COLBY.

ALLEGED CONSPIRACY RELATIVE TO SMUGGLING OF WATCHES

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on May 11, 1933, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from the president of the Waltham Watch Co., of Waltham, Mass., with respect to the occasional unlawful importation of foreign watches into the United States. The letter contained references to smuggling and other illegal practices, and perhaps unintentionally was so phrased as to be regarded in some places as unjustly reflecting on honest importers doing business in this country.

[1] And also the consent of Russia.—E. B. C.

By request, also by way of correction, and in order that the position of law-abiding importers may be publicly known, I ask leave, as part of my remarks, to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and appropriately referred to the Committee on Finance, a letter addressed to me by the Swiss group of the National Council of American Importers & Traders of New York City, protesting against wrong implications in the earlier letter, and stating definitely the position of the members of that organization, including references to their past cooperation in law enforcement.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee of Finance, as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, May 22, 1933.

Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

SIR: We wish to protest with reference to the general indictment of the Swiss watch manufacturing and importing industry as being in conspiracy with smugglers of watches, as contained in a most misleading letter addressed to Senator David I. Walsh by F. C. Dumaine, president of the Waltham Watch Co., and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 11, 1933, page 3258.

Honest and reputable importers of watches court the fullest investigation, as it is they that come in direct competition with smuggled watches; if smuggling continues, it will manifestly put them completely out of business.

You will agree that importers paying the duties prescribed by law are entitled to protection by the United States from smugglers. However, to the end of protecting their own interests, they have expended within the last few years about $20,000 in an effort to prevent smuggling.

It was through their efforts, and with the cooperation of Swiss manufacturers, that the first large smugglers of watches were indicted and convicted (see case 33-1757-2 Superfine Watch Co. and Federal Mail Order Co.), and since then many others have been apprehended and convicted.

Unfortunately, the present tariff law provides such a tremendous incentive for smuggling and racketeering that to eliminate smuggling entirely is a most difficult task in the face of an average and valorem rate of duty on medium-priced watch of 187 percent.

The same condition existed in the diamond-importing business as now exists with reference to watches, until the 1930 Tariff Act, recognizing the incentive high rates afford to smuggling and the impossibility of the United States Government to entirely eliminate it on goods of this character, reduced the rates on diamonds.

Only a lower tariff will bring the watch trade back to its normal channels, and we trust that this will be kept under consideration when the State Department enters tariff negotiations with Switzerland under the anticipated reciprocal tariff treaties.

Yours respectfully,

SWISS WATCH GROUP,
NATIONAL COUNCIL OF AMERICAN IMPORTERS & TRADERS, INC.,
By ROLAND GSELL.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 1536) giving credit for water charges paid on damaged land, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 95) thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 4494) authorizing a per capita payment of $100 to the members of the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin from funds on deposit to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 96) thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 506) conferring upon the President the power to reduce subsidies, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE OPERATION OF LAWS AND REGULATIONS RELATING TO RELIEF OF VETERANS

Mr. WALSH, from the Joint Committee to Investigate Operation of Laws and Regulations Relating to Relief of Veterans, submitted, pursuant to law, a report, which was ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Your committee appointed pursuant to title VII, Public Law No. 212, Seventy-second Congress, approved June 30, 1932, and in conformity with the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 262, Seventy-second Congress, approved March 3, 1933, submit the following:

1. The question of a definite policy with reference to pensions and emoluments of all kinds for veterans and their dependents is now an Executive function under the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, approved March 20, 1933.

2. Your committee devoted several weeks to public hearings and endeavored to secure the views of interested parties from every angle touching upon the subject of veterans' affairs. The hearings have been printed in four volumes and are available in limited numbers. Your committee also begs to report that this joint-committee work was completed without additional cost to the Public Treasury other than the cost of printing the hearings.

All of which is respectfully submitted by:

JOHN McDUFFIE, Chairman,
Representative from Alabama.
DAVID I. WALSH, Vice Chairman,
Senator from Massachusetts.
WALTER F. GEORGE,
Senator from Georgia.
JACOB L. MILLIGAN,
Representative from Missouri.
JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.,
Representative from Indiana.
JOHN TABER,
Representative from New York.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HAYDEN:

A bill (S. 1774) to provide for extension of time for making deferred payments on homestead entries in the abandoned Fort Lowell Military Reservation, Ariz.; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. SHIPSTEAD:

A bill (S. 1775) to promote employment of adult labor by preventing interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 1786) for the relief of Lucille A. Abbey; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 56) to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOSPITALIZATION OF PEACE-TIME VETERANS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill designed to provide for hospital treatment for men who are termed "peace-time veterans." Under the Economy Act no veteran is entitled to hospital treatment or domiciliary care unless his disability is directly connected with the service and unless that disability was suffered during a war period.

I am offering this bill, which will give to the peace-time veteran whose disability is directly connected with the service the benefit of hospital treatment; and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (S. 1785) to amend section 6 of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, with respect to domiciliary care and hospital treatment, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. I offered an amendment to the original economy bill which was agreed to, which we construed as authorizing the President to provide by rules and regulations for utilizing the hospitals for soldiers whether their disabilities were service connected or not. I should like to state to the Senator that I have just taken that matter up with the administration, because it is my judgment that the economy bill does authorize the promulgation of rules for the hospitalization of veterans, whether their injuries were service connected or not.

Mr. GEORGE. Whether they are service connected or not?

Mr. BLACK. Whether service connected or not, and whether peace time or not.

Mr. GEORGE. I will say to the Senator that I had the impression also that a different rule or order might and should have been promulgated, but the order in actual effect now is confining hospital treatment to those veterans who suffered a disability not only in line of duty, but during the war period. I do not think Congress ever intended that, and I am offering this bill, and offer it in the form of a bill so that it may be brought to the attention of the President, and with the expectation, frankly, that the President himself will modify his orders respecting the service-connected disability cases.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am in full sympathy with the Senator's idea, but I wanted it understood that it was my construction of the economy bill that the President now has that right, which fact I called to his attention this afternoon, and also called attention to the fact that there are 15,000 vacant hospital beds now.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true. I do not controvert the position the Senator takes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think this is a very timely proposal. Does the Senator know that hospital patients who happen to be in a particular hospital in a location probably 500 or 1,000 miles away from their homes, if they are discharged, are not furnished transportation to their homes?

I have had a case of that character brought to my attention, and the authorities told me that they could not defray the expenses of the veteran back to his home because he had gone there of his own volition. I investigated the matter, and he sent me his certificate, showing that he had been ordered from another hospital 800 miles away from the one where he was discharged, and then they would not pay his transportation back to the hospital from which he came, or back to his home, and he is walking as a tramp upon the streets of Johnson City, Tenn., today, after being expelled from the hospital.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know precisely what the rule adopted is with reference to the case referred to by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he realizes that the United States is paying carfare and subsistance for all these men who are going to forestry camps for an average distance of 2,200 miles at the very time when it is denying carfare to these hospitalized veterans who are being turned out into the streets? To my mind, it is a most shocking contrast, a most shocking situation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator that I personally do not believe that the President is aware of the effect of the rule which has been promulgated. It was for that reason that I called it to his attention this afternoon. I offered an amendment to the economy bill, which gave the President power to utilize the hospitals. They are not being utilized. Fifteen thousand beds are vacant today, and about a thousand nurses and other employees have been discharged who could be utilized in taking care of sick veterans.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to ask of the Senator from Alabama and, if I may, of the Senator from Pennsylvania, whether they do not think, in view of what has happened in this regard, that it would be better to try to get the President to undo this whole Economy Act, rather than go along as we have been going since it was enacted?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will permit me to answer, I think I am within the bounds of the truth when I say that I doubt whether there would have been a corporal's guard to vote for the economy bill had we had any idea of the nature of the regulations that were to be made under it. Most shocking injustices come to the attention of all of us. All of us, I think, regardless of party, are heartsick at the way it has worked out.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will yield to me, does not the Senator think that the exhibition we have seen of the regulations promulgated by administrative officers under the Economy Act shows the vice of these broad, sweeping grants of power to administrative officers, instead of Congress passing the necessary legislation?

Mr. REED. I do, indeed, and in saying that I make no complaint whatever of President Roosevelt. I do not believe the man walks this earth who could accept such a dictatorship and have the omniscience to administer it wisely.

Mr. CLARK. I entirely agree with the Senator. In the very nature of things the President cannot possibly be familiar with the details of these various orders. The matters must necessarily be turned over to administrative officers.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 1767) to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DUFFY submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1580, the railroad emergency relief bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO INDUSTRIAL CONTROL AND PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1712, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment providing for supplement of the State regulation of petroleum, intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1712, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

USE IN MOTOR FUEL OF ALCOHOL PRODUCED FROM FARM COMMODITIES

Mr. CLARK submitted the following concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 4), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby established a joint committee to be composed of 3 Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 3 Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The committee is authorized and directed to make a general study and investigation of the practicability of the use in motor fuel of alcohol produced from domestic agricultural commodities, and the advantages of such use to agriculture, industry, and the public. The committee shall report to the Congress not later than the commencement of the second session of the Seventy-third Congress the results of such study and investigation, together with its recommendations for legislation, through the exercise of the taxing power or otherwise, to encourage the use of motor fuel containing such alcohol, and the effects of any such legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not exceed 25 cents per hundred words.

INVESTIGATION OF PURCHASES OF MATERIAL OR EQUIPMENT FOR CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. CAREY submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 88), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the negotiations between the Director of Emergency Conservation Work and the BeVier Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, with respect to a contract proposed to be entered into between the Director and such corporation for the purchase of toilet kits to be furnished as part of the equipment of members of the Civilian Conservation Corps. The committee is also authorized in its discretion to investigate reports of irregularities in connection with any other purchases or proposed purchases of materials or equipment for the use of the Civilian Conservation Corps by any department, agency, or officer of the United States Government.

The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations together with its recommendations.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE RADIO IN EDUCATION—ADDRESS BY COMMISSIONER LAFOUNT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from an address delivered by Commissioner Harold A. Lafount, of the Federal Radio Commission, at the annual assembly of the National Advisory Council on Radio in Education, held in New York City on May 19. It is an able and illuminating address on the importance of radio from the educational standpoint.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am not one who believes that radio programs in this country are deteriorating. Economic conditions have necessitated less expensive, but not necessarily poorer programs. The National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting System are to be congratulated for maintaining a high standard of programs during this depression period. I recognize the fact, however, that many of the 450 stations not affiliated with these chains, and 50 others who broadcast chain programs only a small portion of their time, are having difficulty in providing worth-while sustaining programs.

A recent study made in our office shows that there are approximately 25,000 hours per week of unsold time now being used for sustaining programs. This time is often used to broadcast material of little entertainment and, perhaps, of no educational value. I say, generally speaking, this sustaining time is not used as intelligently as it should be.

Just think of the contributions to the happiness and welfare of the American people that could be made with 25,000 hours of broadcasting time per week! On a basis of 320 words per page to be broadcast at an average rate of 160 words per minute, 720,000 pages could be put on the air each week. If bound into books, this would make two thousand 360-page books a week, or 104,000 volumes a year.

I am not criticizing broadcasters for their failure to make better use of this sustaining time; neither am I criticizing the American public. The responsibility for the intelligent use of these 25,000 hours must be jointly shared. Sometimes I think that we, as part of the public, do not fully appreciate the broadcasters' problems, particularly his efforts to provide satisfactory programs. With limited incomes and rather high operating costs many stations have maintained high-quality programs even when almost superhuman effort was necessary to do so. These are the real radio heroes of this economic emergency.

There are, however, some short-sighted, selfish station managers who are failing to measure up to reasonable standards of public service. They have not only failed to build up strong programs from local talent, but sometimes have actually offended the public by their cheap, tawdry programs and blatant ballyhoo over the air.

The public must assume part of the responsibility for the colossal waste of time and energy occasioned by the broadcasting of so many hours per week of unimportant and uninteresting programs. If radio is to be used more fully in the public interest, the public must interest itself in its use, because in the final analysis radio is a joint venture in which the public and the broadcaster must share responsibility. I believe that we, the public, fail to appreciate fully the potential value of the sustaining time which is now available and free to governmental, educational, and cultural agencies.

During the years of prosperity we led the world in radio entertainment, but gave little thought to the use of radio as a national mouthpiece; however, conditions have changed. We still enjoy the world's finest entertainment, but we are now also confronted with many serious national, local, and personal problems. Thus, in my opinion, a portion of our radio broadcasts should be devoted to a consideration of their solution and to keeping us informed on these important matters, thus beneficially using the broadcast hours and our leisure time. Millions of people, who because of unemployment and/or fewer working hours, now have more leisure time than that to which they are accustomed.

As I have said, I greatly appreciate the splendid programs, both educational and entertaining, presented by our two major chain broadcasting companies, as well as by many independent broadcasters. However, I remind you of the fact that we have 605 licensed broadcasting stations in this country. A study of the published programs of each of the major chains reveals the fact that of that number from 26 to 132, or an average of 79 stations, broadcast network programs. Dividing a day of a typical week into three parts, the published programs indicate that an average of 58 stations are on the three networks between 6:45 a.m. and noon, 88 stations between noon and 6 p.m., and 86 stations between 6 p.m. and midnight. The number of hours per week when there are 100 or more stations on the three networks combined are as follows: 2½ hours before noon, 11 hours between noon and 6 p.m., 6 hours between 6 and 10 p.m., and 9 hours between 10 and 12 p.m.

The object of presenting these figures of chain broadcasting is to show that on an average we have over 500 stations broadcasting local programs whose unsold, or sustaining, programs I seek to improve, and by so doing put to beneficial use already existing facilities, thus eliminating waste and providing educational programs to all our people.

Believing this is a time for action and that further delay in assisting broadcasters to provide additional educational programs over existing facilities would be detrimental to the best interests of this country, I suggest an inexpensive but effective plan, a portion of which could be put into operation almost immediately.

Educational programs could, and I believe in the near future will, be broadcast by the Government itself over a few powerful short-wave stations and rebroadcast by existing stations. This would not interfere with local educational programs and would provide all broadcasters with the finest possible sustaining programs. The whole Nation would be taught by one teacher instead of hundreds, and would be thinking together on one subject of national importance. Personally I believe such a plan would be more effective than a standing army. I shall not undertake a description of the mechanics of this proposed plan other than to say it would be very flexible and inexpensive. I do not consider this a step toward Government ownership or operation of radio-broadcasting stations. The Government's activities would be confined to the transmission and wholesale distribution of educational material and discussions of subjects of national importance to all the stations in the United States, and not to the maintenance of any particular station.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, before I discuss the pending bill I desire to refer to a news despatch which has been called to my attention commenting upon the introduction of this bill by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Democratic leader. I will read just a few words from this clipping:

When the railroad bill came from the White House it was addressed to Senator DILL. He sat in the conference with Roper, Woodin, Moley, et al., when it was drafted. Also he is chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, which has the bill in charge.

DILL passed one of the confidential copies to ROBINSON, thinking ROBINSON would read it. Instead, ROBINSON introduced it.

Mr. President, there is not any foundation whatsoever for that statement. I do not know who wrote it, nor do I know where he got the information. The facts are these: Before the bill was sent to the Senate I talked with the Senator from Arkansas and told him that I would be glad if he would introduce the bill. He rather insisted, at least he urged, that, as chairman of the committee, I should introduce it. I told him that he had been introducing the administration bills and I would rather he would introduce it. He said, "Well, if you want me to do it, if you wish that I shall do it, I shall be glad to do so."

When the bill came to the Senate it was delivered to me and I took it to him and showed him the arrangement of the different sections, because it was rather crudely put together. He introduced it at my request. I desire to correct the newspaper report in justice to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, I shall first discuss the bill in a general way and then take up the different sections. I begin by inviting attention to the fact that the last major transportation legislation enacted by the Congress was in 1920 known as the "Esch-Cummins Law." That law has been in effect now for more than 12 years. Some parts of it have been quite unpopular. I think the so-called "guarantee provision" of the law has been most criticized. That is the provision which directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates high enough to provide a 5¾-percent return upon the value of the railroads.

In the campaign of 1932 President Roosevelt, then a candidate, called attention to the fact that the Republican administration had had no remedy for the railroad situation except to pour more money into the railroads through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the hope that conditions would get better. In his message to the Congress regarding the bill the President stated that he was not ready to recommend a comprehensive plan of railroad legislation, but he does recommend this legislation. This legislation is under two titles, title I being the emergency legislation and title II being that part which might be called permanent legislation.

There are many questions in the minds of Senators and Representatives and in the minds of the thinking people of the country as to what we shall do with the railroads. Many are saying, "Must the Government take over and run the railroads?"

Many others are saying, "Can the railroads ever repay the loans obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?" Most people think they will never be able to do so. Many others blame the railroad management for the present condition of the railroads. It is claimed that the railroads have been terribly mismanaged. Particularly the banking influence in railroading has been subject to attack. I want to invite attention to just a few statistics, however, that I think will show that the railroad managers are not entirely to blame for the present situation.

Claude R. Porter, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has recently set out in an article some very interesting statistics, to which I wish to invite the attention of Senators in connection with the pending legislation.

In 1910 there was 1,850,000,000 tons of freight hauled by the railroads of the United States. In 1932 there was 1,230,000,000 tons of freight hauled on the railroads of the United States, a decrease of 620,000,000 tons of freight hauled on the railroads in the past 22 years.

In 1920 our water-borne commerce at our coast ports was 47,000,000 tons. In 1930 it was 117,000,000 tons, an increase of 149 percent in 10 years.

Our inland-waterway traffic has increased in a similar proportion. On the Ohio River, for instance, in 1920 the traffic was 9,000,000 tons, while in 1930 it was 22,000,000 tons, an increase of 138 percent in 10 years. On the Warrior and Tombigbee Rivers in 1920 it was 600,000 tons, and in 1930, 10 years later, 1,500,000 tons, an increase of 164 percent. On the Mississippi River from Vicksburg to New Orleans in 1920 there was 2,800,000 tons of freight and in 1930 there was 9,100,000 tons, an increase of 219 percent.

I invite attention to these figures to impress upon you, Mr. President, that while the railroads have been losing freight to the extent of more than 600,000,000 tons, the waterways have been increasing their freight by tremendous amounts, and I have not yet, of course, discussed the question of automobile trucks on the highways.

There are some other figures that are quite interesting in this connection. In 1910 the revenue from freight was $1,925,000,000. In 1932 it was $2,500,000,000 in round figures. Thus it cost us more than $500,000,000 more to carry 630,000,000 tons less of freight. That was the return to the railroads. The operating costs of the railroads in 1910 were $1,820,000,000, while in 1932 the costs were $2,430,000,000, or an increase of $600,000,000.

The explanation of these increased operating costs is found in the rate increases of 83 percent in those 22 years and the wage increases of 146 percent in the same 22 years. It may be said that the wages on railroads constitute 63 percent of the operating expenses.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator right in that connection if he has the statistics showing the number of men employed in those years?

Mr. DILL. Yes; I will come to that a little later, though I am not sure that I have it for those years.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in that connection?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I have here the figures. In the year ending December 31, 1920, there were 2,076,000 men employed. On December 31, 1931, there were 1,283,000 men employed. In other words, the number of men working on the railroads had been reduced in that period of time something like 800,000.

In this same connection the compensation of employees in 1920 was $3,000,754,000, while in 1931 the compensation was $2,000,124,000. For that same period of time the interest on the funded debt in 1920 was $500,000, while in the year ending December 31, 1931, it was $592,000, showing that the interest on the funded debt had increased from 1920 to 1931, but the wages paid to employees and the number of employees had been reduced.

Mr. DILL. The figures I was giving related to 1910 and 1930, although the Senator's figures are very valuable.

The difference in the number of passengers on the railroads between 1910 and 1932 is even more striking. In 1910 there were 971,000,000 passengers carried on the railroads. In 1932 there were 483,000,000 passengers carried, a decrease of 50 percent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice the years are just a little bit different. That confuses me.

Mr. DILL. No; they are 1910 and 1932.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator had been giving figures from 1910 to 1930.

Mr. DILL. There were two or three figures that I did not have up to the year 1932. Some of the statistics are not quite up to date, but the rest of them are.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator interpret the figures just quoted as indicating a decline in passenger travel?

Mr. DILL. Not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Or has it been due to diversion of travel from railroads to other agencies?

Mr. DILL. Yes; and I will explain that in just a moment.

In 1910 there were 240,000 miles of railroads and in 1932 there were 260,000 miles, a gain of 20,000 miles. In other words, there has been very little increase in the amount of railroad mileage in the United States in the last 22 years. But in the matter of hard-surfaced roads, in 1910 we had 200,000 miles and in 1932 we had 700,000 miles, an increase of 250 percent in the hard-surfaced roads.

In 1910 we had 458,500 automobiles—that was before automobiles were very common—and 6,000 trucks. In 1932 we had 23,000,000 automobiles and 3,480,000 trucks.

In 1930 the railroads carried 60 percent as many people as they carried in 1920, while the automobiles and busses are carrying 3 times as many people as they were carrying even in 1920. Of course we had no airplane traffic in 1920, but last year nearly 1,800,000 people rode in airplanes.

I think that instead of a decrease in passenger travel, there has been a great increase, but the railroads have lost a great amount of the passenger travel they formerly had; in fact, they have lost practically 50 percent.

There are certain other figures that are of importance from the financial standpoint of the railroads. In the last 20 years the railroad taxes have increased 211 percent. The bonded debt, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] referred to it a moment ago, has increased in the last 20 years from $10,000,000,000 to $14,000,000,000. The railroad finances are in very bad shape. Last year the deficits of the class 1 railroads amounted to $153,000,000, and the reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the first 3 months of this year indicate a still greater deficit for the proportionate time than for the same period of last year.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, under the authority of the Congress, has authorized loans to the railroads to the amount of $366,000,000, and $336,000,000 of it has actually been disbursed through the railroads. The railroads have repaid $20,000,000.

I have here a list of the railroads that are in the hands of receivers. It is rather interesting. Most of them are small roads, but some of them are substantial railroads.

The Central of Georgia Railway, with 1,900 miles of railroad, is in the hands of receivers.

The Seaboard Air Line, with 4,400 miles, has been in the hands of receivers since December 23, 1930.

The Wabash Railway, with 2,500 miles of railroad, is in the hands of receivers.

The St. Louis & San Francisco Railway, with 5,200 miles, has been in the hands of receivers since November 1, 1932.

On March 3 we passed a law that authorized the railroads to go into the bankruptcy courts and revise their capital structures, and a number of them have taken advantage of it already. The roads of any particular mileage are the Gulf Coast lines, having five affiliates, with 1,285 miles; the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, with 938 miles; the International Great Northern, with 1,100 miles.

The St. Louis & San Francisco Railway were in the hands of receivers. They secured an order from the Federal judge permitting them to transfer that receivership to the bankruptcy court, and they have 5,200 miles of mileage.

The Missouri Pacific, which is the largest railroad that has gone into the bankruptcy court or into receivership, has 7,400 miles.

Mr. President, at this point I ask to have printed in the RECORD this table of the 14 class I railways that are in the hands of receivers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Fourteen class I railways in the hands of receivers as of May 25, 1933

Name of steam railway and district to which assigned	Miles of road		Date of appointment of receiver
	Owned	Operated
Eastern district:

[1] The Federal court ruled that a road might change from receivership to trusteeship under sec. 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, and this road has done this, so its classification is changed.

Mr. DILL. Barron's Weekly for February 29, 1932, states that the class I railroads have over $12,000,000,000 of funded debt, and that $6,600,000,000 of that is held by the banks, the insurance companies, the educational, philanthropic, hospital, and religious organizations. I thought Senators would be interested in those figures, because there is so much comment about the percentage of the railway bonds that is held by those organizations.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. My understanding is that the amount of railroad bonds held by insurance companies and others is only 3 percent of the bonds and securities held by these companies.

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator's report is in error, because these figures are from Barron's Weekly; and Mr. Eastman gave us a report that showed over four billions of them being held by insurance companies and mutual savings banks.

Mr. WHEELER. All right; but let me say to the Senator that my figures come to me from the experts of the railroad brotherhoods. They reported to me just the other day that the total holding of insurance companies of bonds and other securities was only 3 percent. We have heard so much about the effect of the depreciation of railroad bonds upon insurance companies, savings banks, and so forth, that I felt that that matter should be called to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. DILL. Since the Senator raises that question, I have here, in the House hearings on the companion bill, figures which show that the insurance companies have $2,600,000,000 of the twelve billions, which is far more than 3 percent.

Mr. WHEELER. But the Senator misunderstood me. Possibly I did not make myself clear. I am not disputing the Senator's figures on the amount of bonds that the insurance companies hold, but of the total holdings of the insurance companies only 3 percent are railroad bonds. In other words, if they have 100 percent of securities, 3 percent of that 100 percent are railroad bonds.

Mr. DILL. I do not know about that.

Mr. WHEELER. So that when we speak about the effect that the depreciation of railroad bonds will have upon wrecking the insurance companies, if only 3 percent of their entire holdings of bonds, and so forth, are railroad bonds, it could not have very much effect upon the savings banks and insurance companies.

Mr. DILL. Since the Senator has brought up this subject, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a detailed list of the amount of bonds held by each of the organizations to which I refer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Life-insurance companies	$2,600,000,000
Mutual savings banks	1,700,000,000
Commercial banks	1,016,000,000
Educational organizations	176,000,000
Philanthropic foundations	200,000,000
Hospitals	157,000,000
Religious institutions	64,000,000
Other public or semipublic agencies	687,000,000
Total	6,600,000,000

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this legislation is not presented as a cure-all for all transportation troubles. It is believed that through this legislation some relief may be secured, and particularly that much information and some valuable recommendations may result that will be quite helpful to the Congress in regular session next January for the passage of a more comprehensive railroad bill.

At this point, Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD the report on this bill, for the reason that it analyzes the bill section by section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The report submitted by Mr. DILL on the calendar day of May 22, 1933, is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 87, Seventy-third Congress, first session]

EMERGENCY RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1933

Mr. DILL, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 1580):

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and for other purposes, having considered the same and adopted certain amendments, report the same back favorably to the Senate with the recommendation that it be passed.

This bill covers three subjects. Title I includes the emergency powers to be exercised through a railroad coordinator. This legislation is to be limited to a period not longer than 2 years.

Title II proposes certain amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act as permanent legislation. First, the amendments of the consolidation provisions of the act give the Commission control over holding companies that acquire stocks of railroads, and thereby effect consolidations without approval of the Commission. Second, the amendment of the recapture provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act repeal those sections and set up a new rule for rate making.

The necessity for emergency legislation is found in the desperate financial condition of the railroads. Last year's deficits amounted to $153,000,000. Reports for the first 3 months of this year as compared with a like period for 1932 showed even greater deficits. Loans exceeding $360,000,000 by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were made during the past year. Some were to pay banks and some to prevent receiverships.

Certain carriers already have gone into the bankruptcy courts under provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, 1933. They propose to reduce their capital structures and completely reorganize. Unless business conditions improve rapidly the Reconstruction Finance Corporation must continue to loan large sums in addition to present loans or many more carriers will probably be forced into the bankruptcy courts during the coming year.

One of the results hoped for from this legislation is that a coordinator with emergency powers to compel the elimination of unnecessary expenses and the duplication of services and other economy measures can protect the net earnings of the carriers so as to stabilize the value of railroad securities and make unnecessary a continued drain on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds. This is extremely important to banks and insurance companies holding such securities, as well as to the individual owners of railroad securities.

Section 14 provides that the Commission hereafter must determine whether or not a carrier asking for a loan is in need of financial reorganization. The policy of making loans to pay interest on railroad bonds that are selling at extremely low prices, without those railroads being compelled to reduce their capital structures and protect their net earnings is so indefensible that your committee believes this policy should be stopped at once.

In addition to these pressing financial conditions is the general need for some one authority to compel the carriers to unify their services and operate the railroads on a more economical plan. Too many of the railroads have been run in the interests of bankers and interlocking directorates of railroads and other corporations. Some railroad managers would gladly free their properties from such control but have been unable to do so.

It is hoped the coordinator to be appointed under this legislation may be able to standardize equipment, cut off unnecessary and fabulously high paid executives, and bring about a better relation between the carriers and their employees, and provide better service for the public.

While this bill gives no control over rates, economies that will result and the new standard for rate-making to be established by this bill must eventually result in lower rates.

While this act grants the coordinator extremely broad powers, his orders are not final. Any interested party, including States and political subdivisions, may appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is given power to approve, modify, or set aside his orders. Because of this provision, the coordinator can in no sense of the word become a railroad czar.

Your committee gave most careful consideration to the proposal of the railroad labor executives. They insisted that economies to be secured should not result in additional dismissals of large numbers of railroad employees. More than 750,000 railroad employees have been dropped from the pay rolls during the hard-times period. There are approximately 1,000,000 men left in service. Your committee believes that the people as a whole and particularly the railroad employees still in service, should be assured by the terms of the law itself that there will be no wholesale dismissals by the coordinator or the regional committees. For these reasons your committee amended the bill so the coordinator cannot dismiss employees, but his orders may result in reducing the number of employees each year by making it unnecessary to fill vacancies caused by death, retirement, or resignation. In case business improves and more employees are needed, the coordinator can make orders to absorb that additional number so long as the present number of employees is reduced.

Your committee believes also that where transfers of employees are made to bring about economies, the employees affected should have compensation for property losses.

The suspension of the operation of the antitrust law and all other Federal and State laws must be justified by the economies to be secured and the public interest to be served.

Some witnesses at the hearings protested against that part of title I which provides that orders made under it shall continue in effect after the emergency period has ended, but your committee decided not to change that provision, because Congress will be in session and can pass any necessary legislation to meet the situation with the approach of the end of the period of emergency control.

No opposition was expressed to the committee regarding the proposal under title II that holding companies should be under the control of the Commission insofar as purchase of stock resulted in consolidation of railroad properties. Without such control the Commission's power over consolidations is rendered practically worthless through the activities of holding companies already in existence, and others that will almost certainly be formed unless legislation of this kind is enacted.

The Interstate Commerce Commission for the past 3 years has been recommending the repeal of the recapture provision of the Interstate Commerce Act. The theory behind this legislation was undoubtedly well intended, but in practical operation that provision of the law has proved extremely expensive and has failed to provide the funds for recapture that had been expected.

The fact that the Commission is required not only to make valuations of all the railroads, but that it must bring those valuations up to date every year, has proved a most serious financial burden on the Government. The principle upon which valuation shall be based has also changed from time to time. The decision of the Supreme Court in the O'Fallon case overturned the principle on which the Commission had based its valuations. The recent decision in the Los Angeles Gas & Electric case by the Supreme Court has changed the rule in the O'Fallon case. Another case, the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac case, is now pending on appeal from the Commission before the Supreme Court. The net result has been to bring but little money into the recapture fund and to encourage a tremendous number of lawsuits over valuations.

At present approximately $10,000,000 has been paid into the fund and $3,000,000 has been earned as interest. The Commission estimates that possibly $342,000,000 more might be collected, all of which the railroads dispute. These facts make certain long years of protracted litigation with doubtful results.

Your committee believes the whole principle underlying section 15a is wrong. It has brought forth more criticism than any provision ever written into transportation legislation. It was never recommended by the Commission. The railroads never asked for it. There was no public demand for it previous to its adoption. Certain railroad security holders believing it would stabilize the value of railroad securities urged its adoption, but after 12 years of operation they are no longer demanding it.

There has been some opposition to returning the $13,000,000 already paid into the Commission to the carriers that paid it. Yet if the law is to be repealed, the retention of this fund presents a confusing problem. What shall be done with that money? It is not the property of the other carriers. It does not belong to the Government. If the law is bad, then it should never have been collected. Considering all these facts, your committee believes the money should be repaid as provided by this bill.

The new basis of rate-making proposed has many advantages. Instead of a fixed return on a valuation that must be determined year by year, and readjusted every time the changing personnel of the Supreme Court changes the principle of valuation, the Commission is allowed a much broader discretion and is directed to consider a number of important factors in arriving at just and reasonable rates.

Under this bill the Commission is directed to consider the effect of rates on the movement of traffic, the public interest in adequate railway service at the lowest cost consistent with such service, and the need of the carriers for sufficient revenue to provide such service under honest, economic, and efficient management. It is directed to revise and correct its inventories, classifications, and valuations of property from time to time and give due consideration to the value of extensions and improvements of railway property from time to time.

Analysis of bill

SECTION 1

Section 1 of the original bill defines the terms "Commission", "coordinator", "committee", and "carrier." The committee amendment adds definitions of "subsidiary", "employee", and "State commission." By the definition of the term "subsidiary" and the insertion thereof in various indicated portions of the amended bill the Senate committee thereby would extend the authority of the coordinator over every company of whatsoever character which is controlled by or affiliated with a carrier by railroad.

SECTION 2

Section 2 contains a declaration of the intent of Congress to prevent burdens on interstate commerce resulting from the present acute economic emergency and creates the office of Federal coordinator of transportation. The committee amendment provides that his appointment, whether from the membership of the Commission or otherwise, shall be by and with the consent of the Senate and that if appointed from the Commission, he shall not sit as a member thereof in the consideration of matters arising from his acts as coordinator.

SECTION 3

Section 3 provides that the coordinator shall divide the carriers into three regional groups and that the carriers in each of such groups shall designate five members to constitute a regional committee to assist the coordinator in achieving certain purposes of the act set forth below. The committee amendment provides for two special members on each committee, the one to represent the short lines and the other the electric lines. These special members are to be consulted whenever the committees consider any matters that affect any such lines.

SECTION 4

Section 4 sets forth the purposes of the act. Three main purposes are stated. The first to promote economies, particularly the avoidance of unnecessary waste resulting from competition; the second to promote financial reorganization of the carriers; and the third to provide for the immediate study of other means of improving conditions surrounding transportation in all its forms and the preparation of plans therefor. The first purpose, encouragement of economies, is stated under three headings: (a) To avoid unnecessary duplication of services and facilities and to provide for joint use of terminals; (b) to control allowances and accessorial services, and the charges therefor, and other practices affecting service or operation to the end that undue impairment of net earnings may be prevented; and (c) to avoid other waste and preventable expense. No substantial changes were made by the Senate committee in these purposes as set forth.

SECTION 5

Section 5 provides that the regional committees of carriers shall carry out the purposes set forth in subdivision 1 of section 4 so far as such action can be voluntarily accomplished by the carriers. A committee amendment provides that the railroads through the regional committees shall not undertake any action now forbidden by any State or Federal law except when specifically authorized by the coordinator. As amended, these regional committees are given no power whatsoever that such committees, voluntarily established without the proposed legislation, would not have.

SECTION 6

Section 6 provides that the coordinator shall confer freely with the committees and give them the benefit of his advice and assistance, and that they shall furnish him with such information and reports as he may desire. Where a committee fails to act, the coordinator may act upon his own initiative. The committee amendment gives the coordinator access to all accounts, records, and memoranda of the carriers and their subsidiaries and provides that the Commission may have the power to administer oaths and require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses.

SECTION 7

Section 7 of the original bill is stricken out and the Senate committee has proposed a substitute for that section.

Section 7 (a) of the committee substitute provides that the coordinator shall provide means whereby labor committees for each regional group of carriers shall be selected by the railway labor organizations which entered into the wage agreements July 31, 1932, and December 21, 1932. These committees shall be given reasonable notice and conferred with by the regional coordinating committees of management and the coordinator with respect to any action or order which will affect the interest of the employees.

Section 7 (b) is intended to prevent any reduction in the number of employees now in the railroad service, or reductions in pay by the coordinator or the regional committees. The exceptions provided mean that vacancies created by death, normal retirement, or resignation of employees, need not be filled to the limit of 5 percent in any one year. In other words, the total reduction in employees during the coming year could not exceed 5 percent of the 1,000,000 men now employed.

Under section 7 (c) the coordinator is to establish regional boards of adjustment where necessary to settle controversies arising out of actions taken by him or the regional committees. Carriers and employees are to have equal representation on these boards and they are to function as provided for in the Railway Labor Act.

Section 7 (d) is intended to require the carriers to pay for any property losses and expenses imposed upon employees by reason of transfers of work from one locality to another.

Section 7 (e) requires the carriers, whether under private management or receivership, to comply with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act and paragraphs (o), (p), and (q) of section 77 of the recently enacted amendment to the Bankruptcy Act. Paragraph (o) provides that no judge or trustee shall change the wages or working conditions set forth in the memorandum of agreement entered into in Chicago on January 31, 1932, between the executives of 21 standard labor organizations and the committee of 9 authorized to represent class I railroads. Paragraph (p) provides that no judge or trustee shall deny the right of employees to join the labor organization of their choice or to interfere in any way with the organizations of employees, or to enforce or coerce employees in an effort to induce them to join or remain members of so-called "company unions." Paragraph (q) prohibits any judge, trustee, or receiver from requiring any applicant for employment to sign a "yellow dog" contract.

The Senate committee's substitute for section 8 merely clarifies the language of the original bill and provides for publication of orders of the coordinator and an interval of 20 days after such publication before they become effective. This is to give ample opportunity for appeals to the Commission.

SECTION 9

The committee substitute for section 9 enlarges the list of those who may appeal from the orders of the coordinator. As amended it includes carriers, shippers, employees, State commissions, or States. It limits the time within which an appeal may be made to any time prior to the effective date of the order. If the Commission grants such review it may suspend the order if it finds immediate enforcement would result in irreparable damage to the petitioner or work grave injury to the public interest. If it suspends the order, the Commission is required to expedite the hearings.

SECTION 10

Section 10 provides for the suspension of the antitrust laws and of all other restraints or prohibitions by State or Federal law except laws for the protection of public health or safety and requirements of the Railway Labor Act.

Section 10 (b) is added by the Senate committee. It provides that the coordinator shall not issue any order relieving any carrier from the operation of the law of any State until he has advised the State commission or the Governor that such order is in contemplation.

SECTION 11

Section 11 contains the penal provisions of this title. The committee proviso declares that no employee or officer shall be required to work without his consent. In other words, the coordinator cannot interfere with the right to strike.

SECTION 12

Section 12 is drawn to carry out the third purpose of the act as set out in section 4. It makes it the duty of the coordinator to make a study of means not provided in this bill for improving transportation conditions. The committee amendment requires that he study and report on means for cost finding in railroad transportation.

SECTION 13

Section 13 provides for the expenses of the coordinator. It is provided in section 2 that the Commission shall provide such office space, facilities, and assistance as he may request, and it is able to furnish. Section 13 provides that the other expenses are to be paid out of a fund which it is made the duty of each carrier to contribute $1 per annum for every mile of road operated on December 31, 1932. This fund is to be assessed and collected by the Secretary of the Treasury. The carriers and the Pullman Co. are permitted to provide free transportation to the coordinator and his assistants and agents. The Senate committee amendments are designed to clarify the section. It was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury who expressed the opinion that it was appropriately drawn to carry out its intent.

SECTION 14

The committee substitute for section 14 provides that the Commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, if it is of the opinion that such carrier is in need of financial reorganization in the public interest. It is provided that the term "carrier" as used in this section shall not include a receiver or trustee. Your committee believed the requirement as to the issuance of new bonds was unnecessary.

SECTION 15

Section 15 was inserted by your committee to insure the right of appeal to the courts. It provides that any final order made under this title shall be subject to the same right of relief in court by any party in interest as is now made in respect to orders of the Commission. The provisions of the Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Act of 1913 provide for an expedited hearing before a three-judge court, at least one of whom shall be a circuit judge, and for direct appeal from the decision of the three-judge Federal court to the United States Supreme Court.

SECTION 16

Section 16 is merely a renumbering of section 15 of the original bill. It provides that this title shall cease to have effect at the end of 1 year after the effective date unless extended by proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof, but that the orders of the coordinator or of the Commission made thereunder shall continue in effect until vacated by the Commission or set aside by other lawful authority.

Title II. Amendments to Interstate Commerce Act

This title embodies legislation which has for 3 years past been recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In this part of the report, sections 5, 15 (a), and 19 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act and the proposed changes therein, are explained.

SECTIONS 201 AND 202

Sections 201 and 202 propose a substitute for paragraphs (2) to (8), inclusive, of section 5 of the present Interstate Commerce Act. These paragraphs relate to railroad consolidations. These provisions direct the Commission to prepare and adopt a plan for railway consolidation. Paragraph (6) requires that the Commission must find any consolidation to be in harmony with and in furtherance of the consolidation plan. Paragraph (2) gives authority for one carrier to acquire control (in any manner not involving consolidation) of another carrier or carriers with the approval of the Commission. Such acquisition need not be in harmony with the consolidation plan, but must be in the public interest. Paragraph (8) relieves such carriers and any corporation organized to effect an authorized consolidation from the operation of antitrust laws and other laws, Federal or State, so far as that acquisition of control or consolidation makes it necessary.

Since the Commission has adopted a plan for the consolidation of railway properties, no reason is apparent for hereafter permitting the acquisition by one carrier of control of another carrier or carriers without regard to such plan, as is the case under the present paragraph (2). Therefore it is proposed to combine such paragraph (2) with the present paragraph (6), which relates to consolidations and requires conformity with the consolidation plan. These two paragraphs are, in substance, incorporated in the proposed new paragraph (4).

The provisions of the present paragraph (3) appear in the bill in paragraph (14). By reason of these changes, the present paragraphs (4) and (5) are renumbered as (2) and (3), respectively, and the last sentence of the present paragraph (5) is stricken out because of the other changes proposed by the bill. The present paragraph (7) is omitted entirely, since it was temporary legislation and has served its purpose. The provisions of the present paragraph (8) appear in the proposed paragraph (15).

Paragraph (4): This paragraph, while it includes substantially the provisions of the present paragraphs (2) and (6), is more comprehensive in its scope and corrects certain ambiguities and omissions. It is intended to authorize every form of unification of railroad properties which may conceivably be in the public interest and to bring all such forms, including holding companies, under the complete supervision of the Commission, which must find them to be in harmony with the consolidation plan and the public interest. It also specifically authorizes control of two or more carriers by a single holding company if the Commission finds such control to be consonant with the consolidation plan and the public interest.

Paragraph (5): This paragraph supplements paragraph (4) by providing that if a single holding company is permitted by the Commission to acquire control of carriers as provided in paragraph (4), such holding company shall be subject to complete supervision by the Commission of its reports and accounts and the issuance of its securities.

Paragraph (6): A means having been furnished under paragraph (4) by which all legitimate and desirable forms of unification may be effected, it is intended by this paragraph to prevent all other forms, direct or indirect. The intent is to make impossible the bringing of carriers under common control through complicated schemes involving numerous interrelated holding companies and like ingenious devices which are now possible under the existing law and which thereby nullify the intent of Congress to subject such unifications to an orderly plan and complete supervision by the Commission. Illustrations of such common control willfully set up to frustrate the intent of Congress are found in the Allegheny Co. and its maze of interrelated holding companies, and in the Pennroad Corporation, dominated by the Pennsylvania Railroad, which in like manner has evaded the intent of Congress through an ingenious corporate device.

It will be noted that paragraph (6) contains a provision that it shall be unlawful to maintain control or management accomplished or effectuated in violation of its provisions. Since the bill does not provide for a criminal penalty for violations of paragraph (6), but merely provides for the Commission securing equitable relief to compel obedience to the provisions of paragraph (6) and of orders of the Commission enforcing such paragraph, it was deemed necessary to include this provision in order that an equity court would have a subject with respect to which it could act.

Your committee has amplified the definition of the words "control" and "management", and has added a provision making it clear that this paragraph shall not be construed as a ratification or validation of any acts already accomplished, which would otherwise be invalid under existing law.

Paragraphs (7), (8), and (9) have been designed to spell out and make clear the various possible forms of indirect control of railroad companies which paragraph (6) is intended to prohibit. These paragraphs have been planned in the light of what has already been done through myriad devices without Commission supervision and in defiance of the will of Congress. They are necessary because of the difficulty in establishing as a matter of law in many cases where as a matter of fact it is known that control or management in a common interest of two or more carriers is effectuated or actually exists. The provisions of paragraph (6) would be of little effect unless the language contained therein were construed to include control or management effectuated or exercised indirectly through the use of legal devices such as holding companies, voting trusts, and combinations of affiliated interests. It is therefore intended by the provisions of paragraphs (7), (8), and (9) to make sure that paragraph (6) covers such types of control and management.

Paragraph (8) contains a definition of an affiliated person for the purposes of paragraph (7).

Paragraph (9) provides that where reference is made in paragraphs (6), (7), (8), and (11) to control it is immaterial whether such control is direct or indirect.

Paragraph (10): By this paragraph the Commission is authorized to investigate and determine whether any person is violating the provisions of paragraph (6), or, in other words, whether any person is maintaining control or management accomplished or effectuated in violation of such paragraph. If the Commission finds such violation, it is authorized by order to require the violator to take such action as may be necessary to prevent continuance of such violation.

Paragraph (11) is designed to prevent the continuance of any control which has hitherto been accomplished without Commission supervision and which may operate to bar or interfere with the accomplishment of the plan of consolidation promulgated by the Commission at the direction of Congress. It authorizes the Commission to determine whether the holding by any person of stock or other share capital of any carrier (unless acquired with the approval of the Commission) has the effect of subjecting the carrier to the control of another carrier or to common control with another carrier, and also has the effect of preventing or hindering the carrying out of any part of the consolidation plan or of impairing the independence of the systems provided for in such plan. If the Commission finds that the holding (and this, of course, includes the manner in which the voting power is being exercised) has these effects, it is to provide by order for restricting the exercise of voting power with respect to such stock or other share capital to the extent necessary to prevent such holding from continuing to have such effects.

Paragraph (12): This paragraph is included to make sure that authority may be had for suspending any proceeding the decision in which is dependent upon the then existing consolidation plan, if the plan has been reopened in some respect which may affect the decision under the proceeding in question.

Paragraph (13): Since the bill makes no provision for criminal penalties in case of violation of the before-mentioned provisions, this paragraph furnishes a means for the enforcement of such provisions and of orders of the Commission in cases where the Commission finds that the provisions are being violated or that its orders are being disobeyed. It authorizes the district courts of the United States to issue such writs of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, as may be necessary to restrain violations or to compel obedience to orders.

Paragraph (14): This paragraph authorizes the making of supplemental orders, and includes the provisions of the present paragraph (3).

Paragraph (15): This paragraph corresponds to the present paragraph (8) and provides for relief from the antitrust laws and other Federal and State laws insofar as necessary to permit carriers and corporations to do anything authorized or required by orders issued under the preceding paragraphs.

Paragraph (16): This is a provision providing for separability of the provisions of the preceding paragraphs in case any part thereof may be held invalid.

Paragraph (17): This is a definition of the term "person" for the purposes of paragraphs (4) to (16), inclusive. The Senate committee has included within this definition "joint-stock company."

SECTION 203

Section 203 of the bill merely provides for necessary renumbering of the remaining paragraphs of section 5 which are not changed by the bill.

SECTION 204

Section 204 is intended to preserve the existing provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act and of all other applicable Federal statutes with respect to the acquisition by any carrier, prior to the enactment of the proposed legislation, of the control of any other carrier or carriers. This is deemed desirable in order that any penalties applicable to past acquisitions may still be enforced, and in order to save, to carriers which have acquired controls under the present paragraph (2), the benefits of the exemption in paragraph (8) from antitrust and other laws.

SECTION 205

Section 205 repeals section 15 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act and provides a substitute therefor. Section 15 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act contains the so-called "recapture" provisions of such act, and rule of rate making. It modified the fundamental rule with respect to rate making contained in paragraph (5) of section 1 of that act by providing in paragraph (2) thereof that "in the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates" the Commission shall so adjust rates that "the carriers as a whole (or as a whole in each of such rate groups or territories as the Commission may from time to time designate) will, under honest, efficient, and economical management * * * earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to a fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers held for and used in the service of transportation." Provision is made for determining such value and for determining what percentage of the value will constitute a fair return. The statute declares in effect that since it is impossible to establish uniform rates which will adequately sustain all carriers without enabling some to receive an income in excess of a fair return upon the value of their railway property, therefore, so much of the income of any carrier which in any year is in excess of 6 percent of the value of its railway property shall be held in trust, one half of such excess to be placed by the carrier in a reserve fund and the other half to be payable to the Commission for deposit in a revolving fund. It is provided that this fund shall be used for making loans to carriers and for buying facilities and equipment and leasing the same to carriers.

Section 205 of this bill proposes to strike out the whole of section 15 (a) and substitute therefor what may be termed a rule of rate making, indicating certain factors which, among others, the Commission, in the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, must take into consideration.

This new rule of rate making directs the Commission to give due consideration among other factors to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic; to the need, in the public interest of adequate and efficient railway transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable the carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service.

Section 206 provides for the return to carriers of amounts which they have heretofore paid to the Commission under the provisions of section 15 (a). Such amounts placed in the railroad contingent fund have been invested in obligations of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of section 15 (a). It is expected that upon liquidation of the fund, amounts earned will bring the fund up to a point where it is in excess of the total amounts paid in by carriers, and the provisions of the bill are so written as to provide for distribution among the carriers of the earnings of the fund, making allowance for the differences in periods of time that payments of different carriers have been made into the fund.

Section 206 (b) was added by the Senate committee at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It covers the effect of the repeal of "recapture" on the income and profits taxes of the carriers affected. The paragraph in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury is appropriate to carry out this purpose. It provides that the tax liabilities for any taxable period ending after February 28, 1920 (which is the date when the present section 15 (a) became effective), shall be computed as if such section had never been enacted, except that where carriers have made payments under the section to the Government, such payments shall be excluded from gross income for the taxable periods with respect to which they were made. It further provides that any distributions made to carriers under this section shall be included in the gross income of such carriers for the period in which this proposed act is enacted. It further provides that the provisions of this paragraph shall not be held to affect (1) the statute of limitation with respect to the assessment, collection, refund, or credit of taxes, or (2) the liabilities for such taxes if such taxes were determined prior to the enactment of this proposed act in accordance with the provisions of the Revenue Acts of 1926 and 1928 or final judgments of a court, or the Board of Tax Appeals, or an offer in compromise duly accepted in accordance with the law.

Sections 207 and 208 amend section 19 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act, the valuation provisions of the act.

Section 207 provides a substitute for paragraph (a) of section 19 (a) of that act. It relieves the Commission of the duty which it now has under section 19 (a) of making valuations of street, suburban, or interurban electric railways when they are not a part of a general steam-railroad system of transportation, but gives the Commission authority to make such valuations when, in its judgment, such action is desirable in the public interest.

Section 208 provides a substitute for paragraphs (f) and (g) of section 19 (a), under which the Commission, after the completion of the original valuation of railroad properties is under the duty of revising and correcting its valuations, and of making a report to Congress at each regular session of such corrected valuations. As proposed to be amended by the bill, these provisions will no longer require the Commission to revise and correct its valuations and to report them to Congress but will make it the duty of the Commission to keep itself informed as to new construction, extensions, improvements, retirements, and other changes, will authorize the Commission to keep itself informed of current changes in costs and values of railroad properties, and will further give the Commission authority whenever it deems necessary to revise, correct, and supplement any of its inventories and valuations.

The proposed new paragraph (g) of section 19 (a) makes it the duty of every common carrier to make such reports and furnish such information as the Commission may require to carry out the provisions of the new paragraph (f) of that section.

Mr. DILL. I desire now, if I may, to discuss the important parts of this bill.

The most outstanding feature of it is the creation of a coordinator, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. This coordinator is the official who is to carry out, so far as he can, the purposes of the bill. He is given extremely broad power; but every act which he is authorized to perform is subject to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission by almost any possible person who would have any interest whatsoever. We have included in the list of those who may appeal not only the employees and the shippers and the railroads, but the governors of States and State commissions and representatives of political subdivisions that might be affected by any of his actions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Under what conditions may they take appeals?

Mr. DILL. Simply on giving notice, within 20 days. The least time for publication of an order before it goes into effect is 20 days; and so long as they give notice within the 20-day period, or before the order goes into effect, the appeal may be taken.

Mr. BORAH. Would the appeal be expensive for an ordinary citizen to take?

Mr. DILL. I should not think so. I see no reason why it would be particularly expensive. The Interstate Commerce Commission are authorized, under an amendment to the bill, to hold hearings on these appeals in the same manner that they hold hearings on the cases that come before them; so I do not see any great expense that would be necessitated.

These orders of the coordinator are to go into effect not less than 20 days after publication. If an appeal is taken, the Commission may suspend the operation of the order if the Commission believes that its continuation during the hearing of an appeal will result in irreparable damage or injury to the public interest. It was believed that not every appeal that might be taken would be such that it should hold up every order, so we have left the matter within the discretion of the Commission with those limitations. If the Commission suspends an order of the coordinator, then it is directed to expedite the hearings so that a decision may be had at the earliest possible date.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it, then, that in order to appeal, the first thing to be done would be to give notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

The second feature I want to discuss is the authorization of what are known as regional committees to assist the coordinator. These regional committees are to be selected by the railroads, and the bill lays down the mileage basis as the basis of voting for the members of these committees. The bill provides that the country shall be divided into three different sections—an eastern group, a southern group, and a western group.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator leaves the question of coordinator, permit me to say that from my reading of the bill it has seemed to me that the Interstate Commerce Commission could have been authorized to do the things which are supposed to be done by the coordinator. I have not seen the necessity, therefore, of creating the coordinator; and I should be glad if the Senator would explain wherein it seems necessary to create a coordinator, when authority to the well-informed and well-advised Interstate Commerce Commission, it seems to me, should accomplish everything.

Mr. DILL. That question has arisen a number of times. It arose in the preliminary discussions of the legislation before it was sent to the Senate. It arose in the committee, but not to such a great extent.

The railroads themselves might be authorized to do the things that the coordinator is authorized to order them to do; but everybody who knows anything about how the railroads of this country are organized and operated knows that every railroad has in its board of directors certain men who have interlocking connections with other organizations and with the banks that finance railroads, and in attempting to do many of the things that would be authorized to be done the railroads would not voluntarily do them. The representatives of the railroads themselves have said that an official such as a coordinator would be a central authority whom they could readily obey and whom they would be glad to obey if he would direct these things to be done, but that they could not voluntarily induce their own boards of directors, their own organization control, to agree to take the action voluntarily or on their own initiative. I may say to the Senator that that argument appealed to me more and more as I listened to the testimony in the hearings and as I studied this measure.

For instance, take the matter of the joint use of terminals: It is difficult for a railroad voluntarily to give up its exclusive use of a terminal; but under this bill the coordinator has the power, if he finds it in the public interest, to order the joint use of a terminal in the public interest and for the reduction of expenses and the economies that will result.

For instance, take the elimination of wastes—and I think now particularly of some of the highly paid officials and of the useless and, as I think, needless executives of the railroads: It would be impossible to have those executives dropped or their fabulously high salaries cut by the organization in the form of the directors who control the railroads; but if a coordinator ordered it to be done, they probably would accede to the order rather than to appeal to the Commission or even go to the courts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I appreciate the logic of the Senator's contention; but the question in my mind was, Why the Interstate Commerce Commission could not direct to be done these things which the coordinator is authorized to do?

Mr. DILL. That goes a step further. There are 11 men in the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am sure the Senator is familiar with the multitudinous duties of the members of the Commission. The ramifications of their work are almost too numerous to attempt to describe or enumerate here. These men are all engaged in literally dozens of cases. None of them is free from the onerous duties upon him so that he can sit down and look at this whole transportation picture, and, as a single official, decide what is best in the public interest, because of the duties that bind him. The bill provides that the coordinator may be selected from the Interstate Commerce Commission; and, while he will not lose his position, he no longer will perform his duties on the Commission while holding the office of coordinator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As a matter of fact, one man may constitute a better executive agency than a dozen men.

Mr. DILL. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is a principle that necessarily is involved in the subject the Senator is discussing.

Mr. DILL. That is what I was trying to say.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is rather difficult to get prompt executive action from a dozen men who, as the Senator has said, have a multiplicity of other duties.

Mr. DILL. Yes; I was leading up to that.

Mr. BORAH. That is true also; but the investigation which this coordinator will have to make, on information which he will have to gather, will be based on information which the Interstate Commerce Commission would almost inevitably have.

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator that under the plan of the bill it is intended that these regional committees will gather this information, and make recommendations, and even take action where they may do so without being in violation of any Federal or State law; so that does not need to be required by the coordinator. The coordinator may also call their attention to other things that he thinks should be done, and if they fail to act he may then proceed to act on his own initiative and his authority.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the proposal undertake at any point to permit the coordinator to suspend the operation of State laws?

Mr. DILL. Yes; the bill contains, in section 10, language that is at present in the Interstate Commerce Act. The law of 1920 authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend Federal and State laws, if it was found in the public interest to do so, in the consolidations that were authorized. The pending bill carries practically the same language, except that it has the reservation of protection to the public health and the public safety, and of the Railway Labor Act, which the interstate commerce law today does not have. They cannot be suspended under the provisions of this bill.

Coming back to the question of the Senator from Idaho, let me take up the matter of making a study of the things which should be done to unify the services of the railways and bring about economies. Again the Interstate Commerce Commission, with 11 members, finds it difficult, because of the other duties of the members, and one man, with the whole picture in his mind, would probably be able to handle it far more effectively.

Take the matter of promoting the financial reorganization of these railroads through the bankruptcy court, as provided in section 77 of the law of March 3, 1933. I doubt very much whether the Commission as a whole could do that very well, but one man, studying these financial organizations, probably would be able to make most valuable suggestions. While I recognize that the Interstate Commerce Commission might do many of these things, it seems to me that, as a piece of emergency legislation to continue for 1 year, and for 1 year more if the President shall so decide and announce by proclamation, it is an experiment worth trying.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, does the limitation as to time apply to all the provisions of the bill?

Mr. DILL. No; it applies only to title I; that is, the emergency provision and the coordinator provision.

Mr. BRATTON. The other parts are permanent legislation?

Mr. DILL. Yes; I am going to discuss those later.

Now I want to call attention particularly to section 4.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the point involved in the question propounded by the Senator from Idaho will he yield to me?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I share the views expressed by the Senator from Idaho. It seems to me that any coordinator who is appointed would enter upon very dangerous ground if he should attempt the exercise of the tremendous powers hereby granted, without contacts with and in complete cooperation with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It seems to me that a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, one who has demonstrated, perhaps, greater executive ability, if that is possible, than others, might be designated by the President to act as coordinator and exercise the powers as coordinator in conference with his associates. At any rate, he could confer with them, and he would have all of the knowledge which they possess, and it would be an admirable and, indeed, a vital background to enable him successfully to carry out the responsibilities devolving upon him.

Mr. DILL. The trouble with the Senator's proposal of having the coordinator who would confer with them, it seems to me, is that he begs the whole situation. Either we should have a coordinator or we should not. If we should have a coordinator, then he ought to be freed from the Commission to do his work. If he is going to be in the Commission, it seems to me there is no need of that provision.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the provision in the bill that the President may select a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission remains?

Mr. DILL. Yes; that is in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He is, however, to be relieved from the ordinary duties of a member of the Commission.

Mr. DILL. Yes; and he is prohibited, by the amendment of the Senate, from sitting in on any case on which he has acted which might be appealed.

I want to call attention to the purposes of the bill as set out in section 4. Briefly, they are to avoid duplication of services and facilities and eliminate wastes. Second, to promote financial reorganization.

Personally, I look on that second section as of great importance, and I call attention to the remarks of the President at Salt Lake in his campaign, when, in discussing the railroad bill, he used this language, after explaining the situation, and in summing up his recommendations:

> Concretely, I advocate, first, that the Government announce its intention to stand back of the railroads for a specified period, its assistance being definitely conditioned upon acceptance by the railroads of such requirements as may in individual cases be found necessary to readjust topheavy financial structures through scaling down fixed charges.

I submit that the policy of the lending of Government funds to railroads to pay the interest on their funded debt, without any attempt to cut down their capital charges, is an indefensible thing. In the past year the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made loans to railroads to pay 4½ or 5 percent interest on their bonds, which were selling for $21 or $22, making a total interest payment of over 20 percent on the cost of those bonds, and within 3 days after the payment was made the bonds have gone down to below 20. This bill contains section 14, which specifically directs the Interstate Commerce Commission not to approve any loans hereafter unless the financial structure of the railroad is such that it can continue without reorganization.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. How would it adjust its financial structure? It has outstanding bonds which are selling at a very low price. How is it going to get rid of them?

Mr. DILL. Under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, they can go into court and present their petition; and if a certain percentage, more than a majority, as I recall, of the bondholders and stockholders agree, they may reduce the outstanding bonds and outstanding stocks, and the holders of those securities will be confronted then with two alternatives, either doing that or the road being forced into receivership.

I submit to the Senator that the holder of securities selling far below par, as they now are, with a fluctuating value that nobody can determine from day to day, would be far better off if the amount of those securities were reduced to a point where the railroads could pay their capital charges and thereby make the securities stable in value.

Mr. LOGAN. It means reorganization.

Mr. DILL. It does; and it is intended to bring about a reorganization or to force a reorganization.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think that a very excellent provision of the bill. But, referring to section 14, to which the Senator referred, it provides:

> SEC. 14. The Commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, if it is of the opinion that such carrier is in need of financial reorganization in the public interest.

I can understand why we should except a receiver, but why should we except a trustee?

Mr. DILL. Because under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act the financial reorganization must be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission anyway. They have to approve it in any case.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to correct a statement I made a moment ago. I stated something to the effect that 3 percent of the bonds and other securities held by insurance companies were railroad bonds. I was incorrect in that. I should say the income from railroad bonds on the part of insurance companies, on the part of 342 American life-insurance companies, amounted to only 3 percent. I read a statement given to me by a statistician. He said:

> In 1931 the total income of 342 American life-insurance companies was $4,850,375,950 (Table B). Their income from railway bonds was consequently only 3 percent of the total income.

Then he stated:

> The total disbursements to policyholders of life-insurance companies in 1931 were $2,606,551,153. Income, therefore, even had there been not 1 cent received from railroad bonds, would have been 80 percent greater than disbursements to policyholders.

The general impression seems to have been created throughout the Senate that if we did not do something to bolster up these railroad companies, all the insurance companies and savings banks would crash. The figures which have been given to me have been furnished me by an economist who has made a very thorough study of the subject, and he sets forth that only 3 percent of the total income comes from railroad bonds.

Mr. DILL. I may say that I do not think this bill could be passed on the basis merely of the bonds insurance companies and banks may hold, but I think it is a factor to be considered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I revert to the question I asked the Senator a moment ago? Do I understand the Senator to say that the existing law permits the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend any State law it may see fit to in respect to its operations?

Mr. DILL. For the purpose of bringing about the pooling agreements and the consolidations authorized in the law of 1920.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there any such broad authority as contained in subsection (b) on page 14 which undertakes to permit the coordinator to issue orders that shall have the effect of relieving carriers from the operation of the law of any State or of any order of any State commission?

Mr. DILL. For the purposes mentioned there.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is no limitation in the language on page 14.

Mr. DILL. Of course, he cannot do anything beyond the purposes of the act, and it is subject to revision by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will read the Senator the language from the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should be happy if the Senator would.

Mr. DILL. The act of 1920 provides:

> The carriers affected by any order made under the foregoing provisions of this section and any corporation organized to effect a consolidation approved and authorized in such order shall be, and they are hereby, relieved from the operation of the "anti-trust laws", as designated in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, and of all other restraints or prohibitions by law, State or Federal, insofar as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by any order made under and pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section.

So the language, as I say, is copied from the existing interstate commerce law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That language, which the Senator has just been reading, does not relate exclusively to consolidations.

Mr. DILL. No; it relates to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, the law of 1920.

The third purpose, as I have already stated, is that there shall be a study of conditions, with the purpose of making recommendations as to what should be done in connection with the present railroad situation.

The next important features of this bill, which I want to discuss, are the labor provisions. They are found in section 7, as amended.

The representatives of the standard labor unions came before the committee and objected very strenuously to this legislation unless there were some protection given them against wholesale dismissals of the employees. The committee considered with great care their arguments, and finally amended the bill by writing a new section, with subsections, as will be found in the bill itself.

In a word, these amendments as a whole propose to prohibit the dismissal of the employees now in the service. There shall be no reductions in the number of employees by order of the coordinator below the number of employees in service as of May 1933.

It does permit the orders of the coordinator to absorb the places of the men who will die, retire, or resign during any one year, but not to exceed 5 percent. In other words, about a million men are still working on the railroads. About 50,000 men will die, retire, or resign, probably, during the coming year. At least, that has been the experience of the country in the past few years.

The railroad employees' situation is this: Before the hard-times period began there were employed on the railroads about 1,750,000 men; today there are employed about 1,000,000 men; in other words, 750,000 men have been dropped from the rolls.

I may say that this amendment to the bill is satisfactory to the President. It has been referred to him for his consideration and he has no objection to it.

I may say further that, with the amendment in section 7 to which I have referred, the railroad employees are satisfied with the bill and have no objection to it but are really in favor of its passage.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be that there are to be no discharges whatever of employees?

Mr. DILL. There will be no dismissals in the sense of reducing the number of employees, but the railroads will be permitted to drop them in one place and to use them somewhere else.

Mr. LONG rose.

Mr. DILL. Just a moment until the Senator from Idaho shall have concluded.

Mr. BORAH. While they may be transferred from one point to another, there is to be no reduction in the number of employees except that which takes place naturally by reason of death, resignation, or otherwise?

Mr. DILL. Yes; but I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there is now a gradual increase in the carloadings; it is believed that that increase in business will continue, and it is thought that there will be a demand for a considerable additional number of employees during the coming year. Of course, there is no certainty about that, but, with 750,000 men having been dropped, the Senator can readily see that any particular increase in business will necessitate the hiring of additional employees, and when that point is reached the orders of the coordinator may absorb the additional employees that would be needed.

Mr. HASTINGS rose.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator from Delaware want to ask me a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. Before the Senator leaves that particular paragraph of the section I wanted to get his opinion upon this point, reading from page 9, line 17, section (b):

> (b) The number of employees in the service of a carrier shall not be reduced by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title beyond the number as shown by the pay rolls—

And so on.

It is perfectly possible, as I understand the situation, for the number of employees to be reduced by the railroad companies without any reference to this title?

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; they might continue to reduce them under the existing law if they did not need them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Suppose under existing law they should reduce the number, we will say, by 20,000 between the month of May 1933 and the end of the year; how would it be possible to calculate under this section the 5 percent, and so on?

Mr. DILL. It is based upon the number in service during the month of May 1933, and the Interstate Commerce Commission reports show that very definitely and concretely.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but suppose that number be a million and without reference to this act the railroads should themselves reduce it by 20,000?

Mr. DILL. It would have no effect upon the 5 percent provided for here, because it would not come under this title.

Mr. HASTINGS. The question in my mind is whether this provision is quite as clear as it might be upon that point, and I merely want to call the Senator's attention to it.

Mr. DILL. I do not think there is any mistaking the meaning of it if it be carefully studied.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I understood the Senator to state that the railroad employees were in favor of this bill.

Mr. DILL. I made that statement on the authority of the chairman of the legislative committee of the railroad labor organizations, who came to see me yesterday and said that if these amendments were retained in the bill they were in favor of its passage.

Mr. LONG. I did not receive that impression. Their attorney, Mr. Richberg, said in the committee hearings, in answering a question which I asked him, that he thought the entire philosophy of the bill was radically wrong. He did not think any good could come from it, but that they were undertaking to patch it up with such amendments as that it would do the least possible harm.

Mr. DILL. That is true, and I want to say to the Senator that not until yesterday, after repeated conferences, did they make the announcement I have indicated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber and did not hear the full explanation of the Senator, but if I correctly interpret subdivision (b) of section 7, page 9, it prohibits a reduction of the number of employees in the service of the carriers below the number carried upon the rolls in May 1933.

Mr. DILL. That is true.

Mr. KING. Suppose two roads were consolidated under the direction of the coordinator or suppose a road goes into bankruptcy and is compelled to reduce a large part of its force?

Mr. DILL. There is a difference. If a road goes into bankruptcy that is by its own act; if it is consolidated by order of the coordinator, that comes under this title. In the first case, the carrier could not reduce the number of employees below those on its rolls in May 1933, and in the second case, of course, going into bankruptcy is not under this proposed law, and therefore, if enacted, it would have no effect.

Mr. KING. That is to say, if a road went into bankruptcy and it became necessary to reduce the number of employees it could be done?

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes.

Mr. KING. But if, in the interest of economy and efficiency, two roads were consolidated under direction of the coordinator, then, all of the employees must be retained.

Mr. DILL. They must be kept on the rolls; they may be given different positions; but their compensation must not be reduced and they must not be dropped.

Mr. KING. For how long must they be retained—indefinitely?

Mr. DILL. They must be retained during the period of this emergency act.

Mr. KING. There is another section in the bill which provides, if I understand the measure, that employees are to be indemnified for any damage which they may sustain by reason of being transferred from one place to another.

Mr. DILL. Yes; for the loss they might sustain because of having to give up their homes and being unable to sell them. That is not entirely new in the railroad negotiations between carriers and the employees. Such damage has been allowed in many cases and has been very urgently insisted upon by the employees' organizations.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BONE. Does the bill in the shape that it now lies on our desks contain all the committee amendments?

Mr. DILL. Yes; they are all in the bill.

Mr. BONE. Are they printed in italics?

Mr. DILL. They are printed in italics.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refer to another branch of the subject. The railroads of the United States have had a great history. It seems to me their greatest handicap has been their own standpatism, as exercised by their managers and their directors. They have clung to the old equipment and the old methods of railroading in the face of all the developments and inventions around them that have resulted in business being taken away from them. I repeat that a large part of their failure to meet the new conditions is due to the management and the connection that those in charge of the management have had with other industrial and financial organizations throughout the country. There are, however, some signs that they are beginning to wake up and to take the American attitude on this question. Senators know, if they are familiar with the European transportation situation, that during the last 2 or 3 years European railroads have been quite active in developing new and lighter equipment for their railroads. The Germans have only recently put on a 2-car train from Berlin to Hamburg with Diesel engines, the whole train being one car connected together, with the engine in the car, and that train runs an average of over 90 miles an hour. The French have developed light coaches with rubber-tired wheels that prevent noise and avoid the jarring effect of the ordinary railway truck, and those coaches will seat 40 people.

In this country our railroads are beginning to experiment. The Pennsylvania has built one of the aluminum coaches. The Budd Wheel Co. and the Goodyear Co. are building rubber-tired coaches. I want to call attention particularly to an announcement in the New York Tribune of Wednesday of this week of the new streamline train that it is proposed to build for the Union Pacific. It is a 3-car train. It is announced by W. A. Harriman, the chairman of the board of directors, and I made some notes of the things that will result from the kind of train this will be.

It will have an electric drive, with a 660-horsepower internal-combustion engine, connected to electric generators and motors in the cars. It will have three cars all hooked together and all enclosed together. There will be a 30-foot railway post office and baggage compartment on it. It will carry 60 people on the second car and 56 people on the third car. It will have a kitchen at the rear and will serve meals by a new arrangement in the seats of the car. It will be air cooled and air conditioned all through. It will weigh 80 tons. That is the weight of one Pullman car today. The ordinary passenger train of 10 passenger cars weighs a thousand tons. This is to my mind the beginning of the railroad managers' using the genius and the inventive skill of our own people to meet the competition of other forms of transportation.

I should like to have printed in the RECORD at this point the article from the New York Tribune describing this new train.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, May 24, 1933]

STREAM-LINED TRAIN TO REACH 110 MILES SPEED—UNION PACIFIC ORDERS MOTOR-DRIVEN CARS OF ALUMINUM OR LIGHT STAINLESS STEEL

W. A. Harriman, chairman of the board of the Union Pacific Railroad, announced yesterday that its executive committee had authorized the immediate placing of an order for the first streamlined, articulated, motor-driven train to be built in the United States. It will be ready in about 6 months and will be capable of a maximum speed of 110 miles an hour and a sustained speed of 90 miles an hour on level straightaway stretches.

It will be an all-metal, light-weight train of three closely jointed units or cars, whose tubular construction will give them such strength as to obviate the necessity for the heavy undercarriages which support ordinary passenger coaches. The new 3-car train will not weigh more than 80 tons. That is the weight of one modern Pullman sleeper. A modern 10-car passenger train, including the locomotive, weights about 1,000 tons.

The Union Pacific, of whose board of directors Mr. Harriman became chairman July 14, 1932, has been considering for several months making radical changes in passenger equipment to meet existing conditions. E. E. Adams, vice president, in charge of engineering, who conducted the research and development work on the new train, said only last Friday that the road had a light-weight, high-speed train under consideration, but added that the project was "still in the dream stage."

An order for a demonstration train of three cars will be placed immediately, Mr. Harriman announced yesterday. This train will be operated at first on special runs between the larger cities on the Union Pacific system to test its practicability for regular main line, through passenger service, including transcontinental runs.

The train, drawings of which somewhat resemble a gigantic tri-segmented inchworm with the rudder-like tail of the green moray, will attain lightness not only through the elimination of cumbersome underbodies but through its construction material. It will be built either of an aluminum alloy which has the strength of steel with one third the weight, or of stainless steel, which has three times the strength of ordinary steel and, therefore, requires the use of only one third as much metal.

AIRPLANE INVENTIONS UTILIZED

The design utilizes discoveries in the automotive and aeronautic fields and the streamlining will be carried to a finer point than has been attempted either in this country or abroad. The middle car shares its trucks with the car ahead and the car behind and the vestibuled joint is flush with the sides of the cars, as are the windows, which are of shatterproof glass. Headlights, tail lights, whistles, bells, and similar appurtenances are to be recessed into the car body. When the doors are opened by an automatic device steps are let down to the level of a station platform.

To obtain the highest possible refinement of streamlining models will be built with varying end tapers which will be tested in a wind tunnel to see which is the most efficient. Proper streamlining, it is said, will enable a train so designed to attain a speed of 100 miles an hour with 50 percent of the power used to drive an ordinary train at that pace.

The train is to be fully air conditioned. The windows will be sealed and forced ventilation will keep the cars warm in cold weather and cool in hot weather, filter out all dust, and maintain a pressure which will prevent cinders or other matter from gaining entrance.

The first car carries a 600-horsepower internal-combustion engine burning a distillate, a nonexplosive fuel, and connected directly with an electric generator and motors on the wheels of the forward truck.

MEALS SERVED IN SEATS

The motor car will have a 30-foot railway post-office and a baggage compartment. The second car is a coach seating 60 passengers. The third car, also a coach, has seats for 56 passengers and a buffet kitchen in the rear from which light meals may be served to passengers in their seats. There will be no sleeping accommodations on the first train, but a sleeper has been designed and will be built when the adaptability of the train to long runs has been demonstrated.

Mr. Harriman, under chairmanship directors of the Union Pacific authorized trial of this radical experiment to meet a situation caused by steady decline in railroad passenger traffic since 1920, is the son of the late Edward H. Harriman.

Mr. DILL. The principal thing that the railroads must do if they are to get back their passenger traffic, of course, is to reduce rates in order to meet bus competition; and, of course, they can do it.

Unless there are other questions as to this title, I am not going to take any further time on it.

Title 2 proposes permanent legislation. The first part of title 2 amends the section that relates to consolidation and gives the Interstate Commerce Commission control over holding companies. Holding companies have been created in this country—there are two of them particularly, the Allegheny Corporation and the Penn Road Corporation—to go out and buy up railroad stocks. There is no law by which they can be reached. They issue their securities without the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission and they actually bring about consolidations of railroads over which the Commission has no control whatsoever. This amendment proposes to place them under the control of the Commission, and not only to place the holding companies under the control of the commission but the bill goes further and provides that the Commission shall have control of any other device that the lawyers may invent to circumvent the control of the Commission of the present methods of consolidation. Such a provision has been recommended by the Commission ever since 1926.

The other part of title 2 that is of a permanent nature is the repeal of section 15a, which is what is known as the "recapture clause" of the Transportation Act. The Commission has recommended its repeal for the past 3 years, and briefly I want to explain why section 15a has been so extremely unsatisfactory and why nobody today is advocating its retention.

Under section 15a the Interstate Commerce Commission must determine the valuation of every railroad in the United States for rate-making purposes and then renew that valuation or bring it up to date every year. That sounds as though it were a comparatively easy matter, but in actual operation it has been found to be almost impossible. The principal reason is that the commission has been compelled to give continual attention to court decisions; in fact, it must value according to the principles of valuation which the Supreme Court of the United States establishes; and the principles and rules of valuation of the Supreme Court of the United States change with the changing personnel of that tribunal. The commission thought it understood the rules of valuation, but in the O'Fallon case an appeal was taken and the Supreme Court changed the rule and said that the Commission had not attached sufficient importance to the reproduction cost of the railroad. So the Commissioners had to revise not only that value but all the other values.

A few days ago the Los Angeles Gas & Electric case came before the Supreme Court of the United States and a majority of that court held that there should not be placed so much weight on reproduction cost, because reproduction cost now would make the valuation go down much further. So again the Commission must change its entire valuation system because the court has laid down a new rule of valuation.

The railroads have appealed the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac case on the valuation question, and by the time it reaches the Supreme Court they may lay down a different rule if we have some new judges. In practical operation it has been found almost impossible to fix the valuations for the purpose of having the Commission recapture one half of the excess over and above 5½ percent.

In the 12 years the law has been in operation a little over $10,000,000 has has been paid in to the Interstate Commerce Commission. With interest, it amounts to about $13,000,000. The estimates of the engineers and valuation experts of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that about $342,000,000, in their judgment, is still due, but those estimates were made on the valuation of the O'Fallon case, and now they must be reduced according to the valuation of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric case, and before they get that done they may change it again, the railroads, naturally, fighting every step of the way. There will be years of further valuation studies, and then the railroads, following the practice they have been pursuing, will go into court and years more of litigation in the Supreme Court of the United States will follow. The fact of the matter is that the whole principle underlying the recapture provisions of section 15a is a wrong principle. There has been more criticism directed against the guaranty provision than any other part of any Interstate Commerce Act that was ever written.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true that under section 15a the rates were fixed and paid by the shippers and moneys collected, and those moneys have been impounded, presumably impounded by the railroads, and are now being held, which in reality belong to and should be returned to the shippers if section 15a is to be abrogated?

Mr. DILL. That is a contention that has been made. In the first place, there is about $10,000,000 that has been paid in. In the second place, it would be extremely difficult to tell to what shippers it belonged, where those shippers are, and just how to figure it all out.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not think we will have any trouble with it. I think I can give the information to the Senator in a few minutes. I have it in my office and have just sent for it.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator can name the shippers and determine the particular amount that goes to the different shippers, he is a better expert than I have ever heard of.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Washington that the money was collected for the Government.

Mr. DILL. No; for the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be used for helping the weak roads. The money does not belong to the Government. It does not belong to the other railroads. It does not belong to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is a part of a fund to be placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission to be used by that Commission in such manner as they shall decide to help strengthen the weak railroads of the country.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true the money was collected by way of imposition of tariffs upon shippers, which imposition of tariffs would not have been sanctioned had it not been for section 15a?

Mr. DILL. These tariffs were general tariffs, and comparatively few roads found those tariffs brought to them an excess over 5½ percent. The striking thing about it is that many of the strongest roads financially had no excess and have paid in no excess, while a number of the weakest roads financially have paid in this money.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly what I had in mind, that those who collected it by reason of legislative sanction under 15a have retained it to their benefit, and it belongs in fact to the shippers, because it is an excess charge and never would have been imposed in the first instance except by sanction of section 15a.

Mr. DILL. But the Senator does not get out of the maresnest by having the $10,000,000 returned, because there is $343,000,000 in dispute, and they must fight the thing through the courts for the next 10 years. I do not believe the American people want us to go on spending millions of dollars over this proposition.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the Senator's argument, as last expressed, is based on the theory that we can defeat justice by a continued course of litigation, I must, of course, yield; but I am not ready to yield that either to the American court or to the law of the country.

Mr. DILL. I recognize that the theory of the Senator may be justified, but in actual practice the more we study the situation the more convinced we will become—at least, that has been my experience—that the only thing to do is to repeal the law, get rid of this problem, quit spending money, put the Interstate Commerce Commission upon a different basis of rate making for railroads, and forget the whole thing as a colossal mistake. During the past 2 years I have been opposed to such a provision as this, but the reason was that I had not given it the study and learned the facts as I have in the past few weeks. I have been convinced against my will that the only wise thing to do under all the circumstances is to wipe this matter off the books and go on our way and let it be marked down as one of the colossal mistakes we have made in relation to our railroad transportation.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I gather from the Senator's statement that we are now teetering back and forth between two conflicting theories of law with respect to rate making, one the doctrine of prudent investment and the other the doctrine of reproduction costs.

Mr. DILL. We are, and we will continue to do that with the changing personnel of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BONE. My only worry is whether there is anything in the bill—I have not had an opportunity to examine it carefully—that attempts to define what shall be the theory of value.

Mr. DILL. There is, and I shall discuss it later. I only want to say this further about the principle underlying section 15a. The railroads never asked for this provision in the law. The Interstate Commerce Commission never recommended it. There was never any public demand for it. It was written into the statute largely at the suggestion and request of a representative of the securityholders. I think it was done in good faith. He conceived the idea that by a fixed rate of return the value of securities would be stabilized, and that by the surplus earnings over and above the fixed rate being used in the way provided for, there would be a fund created to help hold up the weak roads. In theory it sounded attractive, but in practice it has proved almost impossible of administration. In fact, I believe that the principle was presented largely as a result of the fact that the Government during the war proceeded on that theory. We paid the railroads a certain fixed amount for the use of the roads, and we, of course, stabilized railroad securities. I think it was largely as the result of that action that the proposition was conceived and presented. It may have had much influence in bringing about its adoption.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] has brought up another matter which I intended to discuss in connection with the return of the $13,000,000. If we do not return it, what are we going to do with it? It does not belong to the Government. It does not belong to the other carriers. The Senator suggests that it may be returned to the shippers, but to pick out the individual shipper who was overcharged on one part of the system as against another one is an impractical and impossible task.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Inasmuch as we seem to have these million dollars that we hardly know what to do with, I am in some way reminded of the colored brother who saw a chicken out in the road all alone, and said he did not feel like leaving it there subject to the ravages of the elements.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I believe that this money never should have been collected. In the light of all the confusion and all the difficulties of dealing with it, it seems to me that the least wrong and the least injury and the least trouble will result if we turn it back and wipe the whole thing off the statute books and cut down the tremendous expense of the Interstate Commerce Commission that has been imposed by this particular statute.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I trust the Senator will pardon my further interruption. My thoughts may ramble a little astray in following his suggestion that there is nothing to do with this money and that we cannot do anything with it. The same proposition will come before this body within the next 12 months.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I would rather not be diverted, though if it is something relating to the bill, of course, I am perfectly willing to have the Senator proceed.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am just using it as an analogy. At the conclusion of the Senator's remarks on this particular phase, if he will yield——

Mr. DILL. I shall conclude in a moment and the Senator can take the floor in his own right then.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well; I shall wait.

Mr. DILL. I thank the Senator.

My colleague [Mr. BONE] asked whether or not we set up a new basis of rate making in the bill. On page 27 of the bill, in subsection 2, under section 205, we have attempted to set up a basis of rate making. It is a broad basis. The basis under section 15a has been a rigid rule depending on the fixed valuation each year which in turn was dependent upon the changing principles of the Supreme Court that would be changed by the changing personnel from time to time. The provision in the pending bill attempts to set up a basis for making rates that will consider the effect rates will have on the movement of traffic, rates consistent with furnishing adequate and efficient railroad service, and the amount of revenue needed to provide such service under an honest, economic, and efficient management. It is a very broad basis, it is a very general basis, and yet I do not believe that we can set up a rate-making basis and leave out these considerations. I believe in the consideration of these bases it will be found to be a much more nearly just and reasonable system of rates that will result than under the policies which we have been pursuing.

Mr. President, I think I have discussed the bill in a general way so far as I care to do. If there are any questions Senators want to ask as to any part I have not discussed I shall be glad to answer them. Generally speaking, I would rather discuss the amendments as we shall reach them in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill may be read for amendment, committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OUR CONSTANT RULERS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything about the publicity that is being given in the papers and in the congressional committees to the investigation of the House of Morgan; but such statements have gone into the papers, one of which I am going to refer to, that it seems as if someone from this side of the Chamber should say something on the subject.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Black	Byrnes	Costigan
Ashurst	Bone	Capper	Couzens
Austin	Borah	Caraway	Dale
Bachman	Bratton	Carey	Dickinson
Bailey	Brown	Clark	Dieterich
Bankhead	Bulkley	Connally	Dill
Barbour	Bulow	Coolidge	Duffy
Barkley	Byrd	Copeland	Erickson

Fletcher	Keyes	Norris	Stephens
Frazier	King	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
George	La Follette	Overton	Thomas, Utah
Glass	Lewis	Patterson	Thompson
Goldsborough	Logan	Pope	Townsend
Gore	Lonergan	Reed	Trammell
Hale	Long	Reynolds	Tydings

Hatfield	McGill	Russell	Wagner
Hayden	McKellar	Schall	Walsh
Hebert	McNary	Sheppard	Wheeler
Johnson	Metcalf	Shipstead	White
Kean	Murphy	Smith
Kendrick	Neely	Steiwer

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to send to the desk, with other exhibits, a clipping of which I ask the clerk to read the headline and the first paragraph only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ROOSEVELT SON BACKS MORGAN

BOSTON, May 25.—Beginning his address with the history of the Morgan family and its close relation with Boston and New England, James Roosevelt, son of the President, defended "the unquestioned honesty and integrity of the House of Morgan and its head" over the radio tonight.

Mr. LONG. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask that the entire article may be included in the RECORD, but I desire to have it back at this time in order to be able to refer to it.

Mr. President, I had not intended, and I had hoped that I would not, and that none of us on this side of the Chamber would be called on, to say anything with regard to the unsavory disclosures going on in the investigation of the House of Morgan. They were a source of considerable humiliation to the members of our party who fought for the success of the ticket in the last campaign. They were a source of even more humiliation to many of us who were actively engaged in the preconvention work of nominating President Roosevelt. I feel that the publication of these disclosures is not only doing the party harm but it is unjustly reflecting upon the man who sits at the head of the executive department of this country.

The disclosure relative to the participation on the part of a Cabinet member; the disclosure of the participation on the part of the former chairman of the National Democratic Committee, Mr. Raskob, and his apparent desire to "reciprocate" for the favors which he has received, followed by the very unfortunate statement, which I have sent to the desk, from the President's son that he considers the reputation and integrity of the House of Morgan and of Mr. J. P. Morgan to be above question, without some explanation from this side of the Chamber, we would leave it to be understood that the President of the United States feels that he can rely upon the course of conduct of the House of Morgan for the care and protection of the people of this country.

Mr. President, the condition in which the Democrats of this country find themselves is a very unfortunate one. They are almost locked up in the same house with the recent administration of the Republican Party that was voted out of existence by the people of this country in November. After having pledged the people to drive the money changers from the temple, after having given the people to understand that there would be a turn to the right, a turn to give the people of this country control of the Government, we find lists flaunted in our faces where stocks being marketed on the exchange at $37 a share were being supplied to people high up in the councils of both of the great parties at $20 a share, with the right to have them immediately sold and the profit, as shown by the difference between the purchase price and the market price, immediately to be transmitted to the beneficiary of such practices.

Why? I have heard of several religions whose advocates say that the only way to be certain of inculcating certain religious beliefs in the minds of people is to get them when they are young; that a child taught along certain lines until he is 5 or 6 or maybe 10 years of age becomes of a certain religious leaning and belief, from which he will never depart, regardless of what he learns in the course of his future life.

Mr. President, this disclosure as to the House of Morgan, and as to the financial market-rigging set-up of this country and of the whole world, shows that they have taken the prospective persons of influence, the great and the near-great and the maybe-to-be great, and have absorbed them in the incubator. They have reached them in their days of youth and in their days of growing promise. They have bandaged them and they have banded them. They have given them the balm of Gilead that the House of Morgan gives only to the select, and those whose services may be of some benefit to the country, so that when the fateful hour may have arrived no man will have escaped the confidence of the house through which he has been a recipient of the blessings of this kind of conduct, assuming, therefore, that he will be in no position to do anything to upset it if he reaches a place of power in the life of the Government where he might be of service to the people.

Mr. Morgan says that he has paid no income tax; and this brings me to say to the Senate and to the country that when we were in the convention in Chicago, undertaking to nominate Franklin Roosevelt, President, the one thing that was brought to the ears of men like the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and myself was that unless an assurance could be given that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General were not going to be inimical to Wall Street certain influences were not going to allow Roosevelt to be nominated President of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I recall, in the President's inaugural address, a very strong statement something to this effect, which I think impressed the country:

The money changers must be driven from the temple.

I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has the courage with reference to these matters to point out some of the facts in connection with the money changers. I am sure all of us will be glad to help the President drive the money changers out of the temple.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator. I want to undertake, in the few moments at my command here now, not only to help drive the money changers out of the temple but to impress this country with the fact that President Roosevelt is not responsible for what apparently is a policy by which today the money changers have been put in the pulpit instead of being driven out of the temple. I do not want the country to think that we have reached back on the back seats and hauled up the Wall Street element and put them in the choir to sing songs, which apparently the kind of publicity that the party is getting at this time would lead us to believe, if we did not know to the contrary.

Now, Mr. President, I want to review just what is the policy of the Treasury Department, not only now but formerly; and I do not blame our present policy, except for having continued what has been, and rather seems, according to the old song, destined to continue indefinitely:

What has been is to be, and forever will be; world without end. Amen.

[Laughter.]

I want to review what cropped out in this matter. Under the Treasury Department's ruling of past years, when anything came in there, anything from Morgan and from Morgan's partners, or from Morgan's clients, or even vouched for by Morgan, there was a notation made that there was to be no investigation made of the return made by J. P. Morgan, or by his partners, or by one for whom Morgan's house stood sponsor, regardless of what income he reported. That went into the record of this investigation. That was not anything we did not know. We did not have the proof of it, as this hearing has developed, but we knew they were doing that all the time.

We have been talking about the honor of men. A man has been chosen to go into the Treasury Department of the United States whom we find mired all over with the mud of Wall Street interests, but it is said, and we believe, he is an honest man; he is a bright and capable man, and will do nothing dishonest. Then a man is chosen to be his assistant, and we find he is mired up with the House of Morgan, and it is said that he is an honest, capable man, and that he will do nothing except what is fair and honorable in his administration. Then a lawyer for the same Department is chosen, and we find that he is messed up with the House of Morgan, and we come in and chant the blessed song that he is a fair and honorable and righteous man, and that he will do nothing except what is right in the department.

Men of the Senate, you do not have to eat a whole beef to tell it is tainted. Do you think you are going to be able to pull men out of that environment and make them Secretary of the Treasury and Assistant Secretary and Solicitor of the Treasury Department, men who have come out of the House of Morgan, mired with him, and a part of the market-rigging practices in which he has been indulging in this country under the Republican Party and under the Democratic Party for the last 20 years, and let them run the Treasury Department, and expect them to reverse a policy that has always been the policy of that Department? There is not as much chance of the people of the United States getting relief at the hands of that kind of an administration as there is for a snowball to stay in existence going through hell. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, what do we find? I speak nothing except what is in writing. Some of us asked our President to declare himself, and he was ready and willing to do it. I believe he is ready and willing to do it now. I think we will hear encouraging declarations coming from the White House with regard to this matter, if they are not already on their way even while I am speaking here in the Senate.

Some of us went to the President. I went to him after his nomination. I received a letter asking me to make certain speeches in the West and in the Northwest. Newspapers had printed reports that men of my kind, who had been necessary to the nomination of President Roosevelt, would probably do harm in his campaign for election after his nomination. In other words, according to newspapers and magazines, most of which were not friendly, statements were made that men of the type of HUEY LONG, Senator WHEELER, Senator NORRIS, and others, who had been of great help to President Roosevelt in securing the nomination, because of their liberal, or revolutionary, or radical tendencies would be a great drawback in the campaign for election against Mr. Hoover.

Mr. President, I made no effort to embarrass the man whose nomination I had helped to secure.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. May I amend by striking out the names of Senator WHEELER and Senator NORRIS?

Mr. LONG. If those gentlemen want their names stricken out, I will be glad to strike them out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have now the exact words of the President which were so effective with the country in his inaugural address. I quote:

> Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.
> True they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. Faced by failure of credit they have proposed only the lending of more money. Stripped of the lure of profit by which to induce our people to follow their false leadership, they have resorted to exhortations, pleading tearfully for restored confidence. They know only the rules of a generation of self-seekers. They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish.
> The money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of the restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I not only heard those words and read them, but I wish to say to my friend from Indiana that I believe that our President is undertaking today to carry out those pronouncements, and I hope to help him. I hope later to relieve him from hampering influences which seem to be gathering about to prevent the fulfillment of that promise.

I want to go back to the point where I was. When I had seen in the public press that the so-called "liberal" or radical element that was necessary to the nomination of President Roosevelt would be a handicap in his campaign, I considered it better that I remain caring for my own political fences in other places and not inject myself into the campaign between Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hoover in the fall.

Later I received a letter or letters calling upon me to go to this place and to that place, none of which invitations did I accept. Later I received a letter or letters from the national organization asking me to make certain speeches in the West and in the North.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to explain the remarks I made just a moment ago, whereby I offered an amendment to the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana, eliminating the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Montana. It was simply because I wanted the Senator from Louisiana to stand out alone.

Mr. LONG. Unfortunately for my friend from Nevada, I cannot let the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] stand out alone, because they put me in the Roosevelt bandwagon, when I was trying to take them out of it. [Laughter.]

I received a letter or letters, Mr. President, asking me to go to the North and to the West. I did not want anyone to entertain any doubt about my position in that campaign, so I wrote a letter back to the National Democratic Committee in New York City, and I sent President Roosevelt a copy of that letter, in which I said:

> If the public press is to be believed—

And I did not want to charge them with the responsibility of believing them—

> If the public press is to be believed, the policy for which I stood in the nomination of the candidate for President—that is, the scaling down of the fortunes and the influence of the power of finance in the controlling of this Government—would be hampering to the ambitions of the party at this time, and therefore entertaining the view which I entertained in the preconvention days, I do not want to go out on the stump in the campaign between Hoover and Roosevelt, because such doctrine is the only thing that I can preach; it is the only thing that called me to support Roosevelt for the nomination, and therefore I will not embarrass the party, and I will not go out at all, and I hope you will see that someone is sent who can do better service, if the reports in the public press are anything like true as to what is going to be the attitude in this campaign.

I received back a letter from the Democratic National Committee telling me that I was wholly mistaken in accepting for a moment any such reports as had been printed; that, on the contrary, our candidate stood as he stood before the nomination. A few days later I received a letter from the candidate himself, our present President, stating that within a few days he would set at rest any such idle and infamous gossip, by restating his position in favor of taking the power of finance out of the control of this Government, and of curbing the big fortunes down to a size that would let the country live and the people survive.

Mr. President, it was after receipt of that letter that I took the train and went to New York City and went on up to the home of our candidate, at Hyde Park, and there I had a conversation with the Presidential candidate. The only thing that I ever asked the candidate before his election was that in the Attorney General's Department, and in the Treasury of the United States, the men in charge would not be people other than those satisfactory to the progressive element which had caused his nomination in Chicago. The President assured me that that was his object, and from that day on I went out and did everything I could. I went where the party sent me, and, for the information of my friends and of the people of this country, I want to say that I let the party send me where it wished, and it did not cost the party a dime to send me; the people of Louisiana contributed their quota more than once to the cause of nominating and electing the candidate of the Democratic Party, and paid my expenses, and some other expenses, in the States through which I campaigned for the ticket.

Now, Mr. President, we face the humiliating fact that, after having succeeded, after the candidate's platform has been endorsed, and after an inaugural address was delivered pledging to the people of this country that the money changers were going to be driven out of the temple, we see today, instead of being out of the temple, they not only inject themselves in the temple but they sit in the seats of the mighty and pass judgment on the balance of us who waged that fight to deliver this country back to the American people.

They tell us that this is a question of unquestioned honor. Yes; how unquestioned is the honor? I want to say, Mr. President, that I was never more disgusted with political life than I am now, and I never realized how difficult it was to do a little good in public affairs until I reflected upon the result after we went out bowing and raking and scraping and scrimping and begging the washerwoman and begging the laboring man and begging every man in the country to give his dime, his quarter, or his dollar, or whatever he could give, in order that we might carry on a campaign throughout this country to liberate the people from the bondage of the power and the control of financiers over this Government and their illegal and unscrupulous practices that have brought the people almost down to the point of serfdom. What brigands we seem when we consider how we went into the plowed field, into the factory, out on the roadside and begged money from the people—fifty cents, a dollar, two dollars—for which I have been criticized—and now see those people facing a spectacle where the empire of the whole country is to be concentrated apparently into the hands of the favored clients of J. P. Morgan, passing judgment upon the lives and fortunes of those people.

It may be the right thing to do, but I refuse to believe it is not condoned by the President of the United States. I resent the insinuations that have appeared in the newspapers; I resent the quotations that have gone into the press. I do not care if they are from the President's son, I do not care who they are from; I say that the President of the United States does not condone, in any manner or form, any such rulership as has been shown to exist, and that the help of this Congress must be not only given but its action must be independently asserted, with the President's help back of it, to bring about relief from this situation.

Mr. Hearst comes out with an editorial in this morning's newspapers. I am going to read part of the editorial.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LONG. I yield to my friend from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to know if the Senator in his remarks is waiving senatorial immunity?

Mr. LONG. For what? The Senator being a judge, I might state that the courts hold that cannot be waived. Does the Senator have in mind something I am saying that he does not know about?

Mr. McCARRAN. Nothing that I do not know about, no; but that the Senator does not know about, yes.

Mr. LONG. May I inquire of the Senator what it is that he has in mind? I hope that I am speaking only from the record. What is it the Senator has in mind, for instance?

Mr. McCARRAN. The subject under consideration, the unfinished business.

Mr. LONG. I do not understand the Senator to disagree that there is anything that I have stated that is not a matter of record, except one conversation, and I do not think that that will ever be disputed. I only speak from the record, Mr. President. It is true we have under consideration a railroad bill, and there is a great deal about railroading that I do not know.

Mr. President, as I was about to say, Mr. Hearst has an editorial in his newspapers this morning. I do not care to put myself in opposition to Mr. Hearst, but what Mr. Hearst says is this:

> DEAR READER: If the House of Morgan wrote you a friendly letter and said: "The so-and-so stock is now selling at $37 a share. We lately issued this stock at $20 a share, and we are holding a thousand shares for you at the price of issue—namely, $20.
> What, dear reader, would you say?
> You would perhaps say: "Thanks, Messrs. Morgan & Co. Kindly sell the stock at the market price for $37,000 and send me the difference between the $20,000 at which you are holding it for me at the price of issue and the $37,000 it is selling for on the stock exchange."

In other words, according to Mr. Hearst's view, which I propose to criticize in a moment, if the House of Morgan wrote me a letter and said, "We want to give you some $37 stock, send us $20 for the $37 stock," I should say, "Go ahead and sell it for $37 and send me the $17 extra." That is how Mr. Hearst analyzes this matter. I am going to show in a moment that that is not exactly correct, but for the present I am going to read on a little further. Mr. Hearst says that a man to whom such a letter was written would reply and say this:

> "Thanks, Messrs. Morgan & Co. Kindly sell the stock at the market price for $37,000 and send me the difference between the $20,000 at which you are holding it for me at the price of issue and the $37,000 it is selling for on the stock exchange."

Says Mr. Hearst:

> You would then smilingly pocket $17,000 which did not cost you a nickel, and you would doubtless add to your letter the significant phrase which John J. Raskob added to his letter of thanks to Morgan:
> "I hope I will be able to reciprocate."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Would the Senator from Louisiana kindly correlate the editorial published in the Hearst newspaper with section 15a of the bill under consideration?

Mr. LONG. I am doing that.

According to Mr. Hearst, Mr. President, every one would have done as Raskob did. I concede that for some that would be a natural answer. In other words, if I were going to be the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and Mr. Morgan were to write me a letter and say, "Now, Mr. LONG, you are a friend of mine; I am thinking about you, and I am going to prove to you that I am thinking of you, not in a matter where absence makes the heart grow fonder, but to show you that my heart is with you because I have in mind putting treasure in your hands." According to the philosophy of Mr. Hearst, which I intend to dispute, when Mr. Morgan writes me such a letter, saying, "I have got the public out there baited to the hook; I have them leaning over the plate to strike at a bad ball; I have these suckers all through the United States, 120,000,000 of them, that will give you $37 a share for the stock; and I am going to keep this market rigged up and pyramided and hocus-pocused in such a condition that you can take this stock that I am going to give you today for $20 and get $17 profit on it before nightfall. I will do it for you if you want me to; I am thinking of you." According to Mr. Hearst had I received such a letter I would have written back and said, "Thank you, sir, for the $17 profit that is coming out of the American people that you have got biting at the hook that is not even baited; thank you, sir, and whenever I can reciprocate call on me and I will be glad to do it." That is the answer Mr. Hearst tells the American people they would probably make.

Mr. President, I contend that that is not the answer that men sitting in the Senate should have made. It is not the kind of principle which is in accord with party fealty and loyalty to the Government one is serving; but if the facts are to be believed, if we are to believe what we see, it is becoming a matter of practical and political impossibility to get anybody in the office of Secretary of the Treasury unless he has in some manner been proved financially proficient by reason of some training in or with or under the House of Morgan.

Mr. Woodin was appointed to that position because the President of the United States thought that he had to have somebody of ability in charge of the Treasury Department and the finances and the money matters of this country. I want to say from my own knowledge that Mr. Woodin was appointed to that position by the President of the United States because the President honestly and truly believed that Mr. Woodin represented a theory and was for an ideal in government contrary to that of the financiers who had been running the country during past administrations. I know from my own knowledge that the President of the United States in appointing Mr. Woodin as Secretary of the Treasury did not consider that he was placing the Treasury Department in the hands of anybody who felt that he was under obligations to the House of Morgan to administer the affairs of the Treasury Department in any manner except in accordance with the declarations made to the people of this country that he was going to drive the money changers out of the temple. The President of the United States, regardless of the harmful statements that may have been issued by those who are close to him, has now, in my opinion, no object in mind except to carry out his party's platform, and in no sense of the word does he intend to have the financial affairs of the people of the United States administered by anyone who, as Mr. Hearst says, feels under an obligation to reciprocate past courtesies in the discharge of official duty.

The Democratic Party has only been in office, Mr. President, for about 3 months. We entered into office under very striking circumstances. We not only found the house in disorder; but whenever we took up a utensil to apply it to its nominal and normal use, we found that it had been allowed to canker and to corrode or that it had been subjected to some kind of abuse that had made it wholly unacceptable for use in the present day and under the present circumstances.

The President of the United States, Mr. President, went into a house not only disarranged, not only in disorder, but he found the necessities of the Government taken out of the house he had entered, and he has hastily been required to assemble whatever government he can from the four corners of the earth and to patch it together with such haste and speed as the circumstances apparently require. In so doing it is only natural that some mistakes should have been made, and we have made some mistakes. I have undertaken to advise against some of those mistakes, but now with Mr. Hearst condemning the practices of Morgan, and Mr. Morgan displaying his list, and with all the supposed animosities that they tell us exist between the House of Rockefeller and the House of Morgan and the condemnations of Mr. Hearst, what do we find the three of them doing? Do we find Mr. Hearst trying to put the House of Morgan out of influence? Do we find the House of Morgan and the House of Rockefeller and the condemnatory articles urging the extermination of one another? No. What do they urge? Mr. Morgan tells us to get rid of the income tax and put in a sales tax; Mr. Hearst tells us to get rid of the income tax and put in a sales tax, and Mr. Rockefeller tells us to get rid of the income tax and put in a sales tax.

When they had Charles E. Mitchell on the witness stand before the same Finance Committee, Mr. Charles E. Mitchell testified that we had to get rid of the inheritance and income taxes and institute a sales tax. I wonder if they are going to be able to pull the wool over the eyes of the Congress of the United States? When Morgan has come here with his perfidy shown to the world, when Mr. Hearst has shown it up as well, when they say the Rockefellers condemn the Morgans and the Morgans condemn the Rockefellers, are we going to let them line me up under the Rockefeller banner, the Senator from Idaho under the Morgan banner, the Senator from Nevada under the banner of Mr. Hearst, and then march us all down one common lane, undertaking to do away with income taxes and put the taxes on the people in the form of a sales tax?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to state that when I select my banner I will select it myself, and I will not ask the Senator from Louisiana to select it for me.

Mr. LONG. My reference was to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARRAN. Without delegation of any kind of authority coming to me from the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], my colleague, who will soon go to represent the greatest republic in the world in the greatest economic conference that has ever taken place, I think I have a right to say that he, too, will select his own banner without the intervention of the learned Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I had assumed that, Mr. President. I had asked the question. I will state it again for the benefit of the Senator from Nevada, who wishes to be understood on the matter. Are we going to let them line up the American Congress, one under the Hearst banner, another under the Morgan banner, another under the Rockefeller banner, when they are supposed to be at odds amongst themselves, and march us all down to a common point, the sales tax, instead of the income tax and the inheritance tax, which those interests would have to pay if they followed the proper conception of the law?

Mr. President, we promised the American people relief, not from the Morgan practices so much, not from the Rockefeller practices so much, but we promised the American people deliverance from a system. We promised the American people—the Democratic Party and the Republican Party too, almost—a better enforcement of the antitrust law. That is one thing we promised them. We promised through the words of our candidate that we were going to decentralize wealth. We promised that we were going to drive the money changers from the temple. We promised these people that if they would elect the Democratic ticket we were going to deliver the country in such a way and into such hands that the burdens of government would be borne by those who were able to bear them, that the right to labor would not be denied one able to perform it, and that the chance of an occupation and the chance of a livelihood would be guaranteed in this country as long as we had plenty to eat and plenty to wear and work to do. That was our promise.

It does not make any difference, Mr. President, what kind of law we enact to curb these interests so long as they are made the masters of the law. We can enact all the laws we wish to regulate the conduct of the financiers, the bloated masters of fortune and power, but it does not make any difference what kind of a law we write on the books so long as we make them the masters of the law. Remember that, Mr. President. It does not make a bit of difference what kind of law we write. I say it again; I say to all the Senators here from Rhode Island and Tennessee and all the other States that it does not make any difference what kind of income tax law we write, it does not make any difference what kind of inheritance tax law we write, if we are going to put the administration of that law into the hands of those whom we are trying to regulate we might as well never have written the law; we might as well say that we are going to put the gangsters out of this country and that we are going to make Capone the coordinating chief in order to put the gangsters out of America.

In other words, suppose we wrote a law appointing a supreme chief to oust the practice of gangsterism from the United States and appointed Capone to be the chief. I am putting the case rather extreme. Manifestly nobody would expect Mr. Capone to do anything. Mr. Capone would come right here before the Senate and hold up his hand and take the oath of office to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, just the same as anybody else would do, but we would all know that the minute he went away he was not going to do anything about it.

Yet we come here promising we are going to deliver the country from the money changers, and we hear presented to a senatorial committee the proof that these people have not only controlled legislation, have not only controlled parties, but they have so rigged up the Government of this country that there is not a chance under the ordinary course of things to relieve ourselves of their masterful influence in the course of two generations. We have no chance at all. We may go down the road in the nighttime. There is a house on one side of the road and one off on the other side. We go into the house on the left and we find it is full of bandits and brigands, and we manage to flee from it after 4 years of punishment. Then we go into a house on the right side of the road and we find the same set or something just like them inside of that house, too. In other words, we got ourselves loose from the set in the house on the left that has been in control of the Government for 12 years, and we prayed to the Lord for deliverance and we got it; but lo and behold, we stepped into the house on the other side of the road, and there was Mr. Raskob, who wrote a man a letter on the other side that he "hoped to be able to reciprocate for the favors received"; and here is another man who said, "I am grateful for what you did for me, old boy. What do you want me to do with this stranger I got in here last night?" [Laughter.]

I know it is easy enough to go over the country and paint some of us as radicals. That is awfully easy to do. All anyone has to say is that "they are radicals and a bad set of men." But, Mr. President, there is one thing we have not done. We have not told the American people one thing and done the other. There is another thing we have not done. We have not supported any candidate on any set of principles until that candidate came out and stated them to the American people just as he stated them to us.

There is another thing we have not done. We have not sat here and seen the Democratic Party murdered in the house of its enemy, and we are not going to do it. That is another thing we have not done. We promised the people a change. I was one of the men who promised them, though I might not have been one whose word was accepted, but at least every State which I entered turned out a handsome majority for the Democratic Party in spite of anything I might have done in the State, and the State from which I hail was a banner Democratic State in the last election, I believe, or one of them. But in spite of that, we told the people in the last campaign that if this party of ours began to manipulate the affairs of the Government with that same old type of chicanery that had dominated the last 12 years of this Government, we were going to speak aloud and undertake to see that it was put on the proper keel and directed on the proper course.

Here now comes a man into the house of this country, almost under the dome of the Capitol itself, and what does he say? "I have a list. It does not make any difference who you name. You can name the Republican politicians living in this country today and some who are not alive; you can name the Democratic politicians who are alive, and I will give you a card index whenever you get one of them named."

Here we searched the country with a fine-tooth comb trying to find someone upon whom we could depend to give relief and deliverance to the people of the country, to give us a chance to breathe the breath of new life, and yet after we have combed the country from Dan to Beersheba and got hold of one, we find out that he was a bed mate of the man we had put out! [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am told that this thing was not only so manipulated, but I am actually told that the influences which had caused one man to accept one of these good offices were the same influences that told our man to take the same office. Here we have today painted before us this sign. Here is a masterful organization. I do not blame them for using the Government as they have used it, because they have been told they could use it. I am blaming the system that permits it. I would not vote to impeach the judge from the northern district of California for the same practices for which the Federal judiciary has been famous for a hundred years. I would not pick out one little judge and vote to impeach him when he has been doing just those things the whole Federal judiciary has been doing for the last 100 years.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. No; I will not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.

Mr. LONG. And so now I will not today personally condemn anyone who is a product of this system. I condemn the system which permits it to continue in this day and time.

Now they come here, all of them telling us that we must relieve ourselves of these conditions; and how do they tell us to relieve ourselves of them? They tell us to vote for a sales tax. In other words, Mr. Morgan has shown us that as a result of keeping those whom he wants to keep in the Treasury Department, we are not going to collect any tax from him anyway. Therefore, he says, "Amend the law, and put a sales tax on the little man at the fork of the creek and the little man in the field, so he will have to pay the tax, and you will not be looking to me for anything that you are not going to get anyway, whether you like it or not." [Laughter.] In other words, he offers us relief.

We have been looking around here trying to get something out of Morgan, a man worth some three or four or five or six or seven hundred million dollars, maybe a few billions, and he has shown us that we cannot collect it, for a number of reasons: First, because he has a way of writing it off in losses. Second, because there has been an order given there in the Treasury Department that the income-tax returns he makes are not to be investigated anyway.

So he has shown us that we cannot collect anything from the bloated financiers of the House of Morgan anyway. Therefore he says, "Now, stop looking under my coat for anything, because you are not going to get it if you find it. Put on a sales tax and collect it out of 120,000,000 American people if you expect to get anything."

Then we see coming along the Rockefeller House. The Rockefeller House, they tell us, is against affiliates with banks, and that the Morgans were wanting to keep the bank affiliates in existence. The facts of the case are that they both would want to keep them in existence; but when we got to investigating them all down here, we investigated the National City Bank, and that looked pretty bad, and the Rockefeller House was about next on the list to be investigated; so about that time it threw up its hands and created one of these smokescreens, something like the poker game I got into when I first went West. There were two men sitting on opposite sides of the table, and it looked as if one of them was going to throw the lamp at the other one every minute, and I sat there gambling with them, trying to keep them from fighting, and when we wound up there was not any fight, but I lost my $20. [Laughter.]

They are sitting around here, pulling off that old skin-game trick again, trying to make it look as though there is some difference between the House of Morgan and the House of Rockefeller, and what are they all trying to do? Why, the whole gang of them are going down here telling us that the thing for us to do is to put on a sales tax and to repeal the income tax, and then Mr. Morgan and Mr. Rockefeller and all the balance of them will get out of it, and we will never have to call them before another Senatorial committee, because by law we will have exempted them even from the right to look into them to see whether we ought to have gotten anything or not.

This is a wonderful system of government we are experiencing. Come, holy blessings that we have prayed for and apparently got in the form of a consistent rulership that we thought we were voting out of existence here on the 8th day of last November.

Mr. President, why all this? We have a bill in the other House known as the public works bill. There has to be some money raised in order to carry it out, some three or four billion dollars. It is necessary to raise that money. This gang, though, or somebody, will have to pay it. How do they propose to pay it? The worst thing they could have done was to put on a sales tax. That is the worst thing that could be done. That would be the most inhumane way possible of raising the money.

The second worst thing that could be done would be to put it on the lower incomes of the country. The way it ought to have been raised, and the way the Democrats of this country promised it would be raised, was by putting it on the powers that were able to pay it at the top.

The House apparently has rejected the sales tax. So far, so good. Now they are undertaking to have the fight between whether we will adopt the sales tax or whether we will adopt the tax on incomes at the lower brackets and the middle brackets. What we ought to do—and I mean to say this more by way of warning than by way of advice—what proves to us that the money changers have not been driven out of the temple, what proves to us that they have not been scaled down in their influence and in the power of being the mighty, is that today, when people are starving and in need of work and are naked, we are talking about raising the money from the starving, instead of going right ahead and putting the tax where the Government has promised it would be put. What we ought to have done, Mr. President, was never to have hesitated for a moment in scaling up the inheritance- and income-taxes, and scaling down the sizes of fortunes in this country.

So I say to the Senate that it is needless to condemn individuals. As long as we allow the few to control the wealth of the country, we cannot expect anything but such examples as we have here now.

I pause here just to make a statement. I think it was very unfair that a Member of this body was included in a list of what were supposed to be preferred customers. It has been shown to my satisfaction that that Member of this body had been a friend to a certain young man, and that that friend, in apparently reciprocating, had written him, and a mere interchange between two personal friends took on the aspect of influence from the House of Morgan, when the facts show that the contrary was the case. I want to say further that in all the national conventions I have ever attended or watched the only name that has been looked upon as anathema to Wall Street, and that promises have almost been exacted from those of us working in the convention that they would keep from ever again adorning the Treasury Department, was the Member of this body whose name was mentioned.

I feel that I know enough, Mr. President, to say that we ought not to feel influenced but that we should feel every sympathy in the world for that unfortunate circumstance caused by a matter of personal relations and to one who felt obligated to our colleague.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that if the Democratic Party is going to succeed it will have to get its house in order, and we will have to help the President get its house in order. We will have to drive from the seats of the mighty whoever may be found there under the domination of the same power that we alleged to be in control of the party that we voted out of existence in the last campaign.

(At this point Mr. LONG yielded to Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, who inserted in the RECORD sundry newspaper clippings relative to disabled veterans, which appear at a later point in today's RECORD.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator reminds me of something. I was almost ready to close. I want to mention the economy bill while I am on the floor.

Our President has made some mistakes, and so have some of us. They came in here with the economy bill, pleading that something had to be done as a result of the pleas of the Economy League. We have developed the contributors to the Economy League, and we find that nearly every one of them—I do not know how accurate this is, but I think almost to the point of complete accuracy—we find that nearly every one of those who have admitted that they have been paying the Government nothing whatever were the leaders in this movement to throw the soldiers out of the hospitals and take them off the compensation lists. They come along here today, shown up as having avoided paying the taxes that they say they paid in other countries. They come along here, showing that they rigged the market, making the poor, unsuspecting public pay $37 for something they sold to a favored few for $20. They come here showing that they have been able to keep this thing in their own hands; and when they wanted to decide upon a method of relief they said, "Get the soldiers off the pay roll of the Government to relieve the condition of financial distress in which the country now finds itself." They relieved us by taking the soldiers off the roll, throwing them out of the hospitals, and now they come here, and we find that they are entrenched in the place of the mighty.

I want to conclude my remarks with an editorial from the Philadelphia Record, an administration paper, supporting the administration now and in the election and in the nomination. I send it to the desk and ask that it may be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of May 26, 1933]

FRIENDS OF THE HOUSE OF MORGAN

"Bet you a hundred dollars you can't jump over this."

The old grad holds his cane a foot from the ground in front of the star fullback.

That's the way they subsidize football players without making them professionals.

"We'll let you buy $35 stock for $20."

That's the way the House of Morgan subsidizes key men in private and public life, without breaking the letter of the law.

It is all part of a sinister system to rule the United States.

The public has sensed the tremendous power which private bankers are wielding the destinies of our so-called "democracy."

But the private bankers have been fairly successful in keeping under cover. While Government regulation was becoming more and more general for every other business, private bankers managed to remain immune. They successfully evaded every attempt to place them under even the mildest Government surveillance.

While we regulate everything from barber shops to brokers, the one business which more directly affects every other business, by controlling credit, hides behind the thin subterfuge of its name, private banking.

A few weeks ago we had the spectacle of members of Drexel & Co. rushing to Harrisburg at the last moment to amend the new banking code so that it should not include them. A few months ago Secretary of the Treasury Woodin issued a Sunday-night order that private banks did not have to answer to the rules laid down for all other banks throughout the country.

Now the private bankers earn the reward of this too clever policy. If, years ago, they had submitted to even mild regulation, and done business in the open as all other business men are now compelled to do, the present revelations would not have caused such a shock to the public.

The game is out of the bag. The issue is clear-cut. It is up to the Roosevelt administration.

It is all too evident that the House of Morgan has been trying to sabotage Roosevelt's liberal policies, to nullify all his attempts to raise prices, wages, and increase employment by continuing the deflationary policy which concentrates more and more monetary power in their hands.

There will now be general suspicion of big-banker influence in the deflationary policies so far pursued by the Treasury under Woodin, in the appointment of former Morgan associates to subordinate positions in the Treasury, and in the character of the new revenue proposals now before Congress.

Those proposals restore war-time income-tax rates on incomes of $4,000 or less, more than war-time rates on incomes between $4,000 and $8,000, but leave incomes above that amount to be taxed at far less than they were during the war.

A net income of $6,000 will pay $600 instead of the $360 paid during the war, while a million-dollar income (for married man, with no dependents) will pay only $591,050, as compared with $703,030 in 1918.

The revelations of how easily the great fortunes of Morgan and his partners can avoid payment of any income taxes are bad enough. These new tax proposals will add to indignation, and increase suspicion of the Secretary of the Treasury who helped frame them.

A complete clean-up is called for in the Treasury, and with it the ousting of Prof. O. M. Sprague, Woodin's new assistant.

The fact that Professor Sprague comes from the Bank of England, the revelation of the bank's connection with the House of Morgan, and the anti-inflationary policy pursued by the bank while Sprague was its adviser breed grave distrust of his appointment.

Roosevelt's one success in fighting deflation came when he overrode his banker-minded Treasury and ordered all exports of gold stopped, leaving the dollar to find its own level on foreign markets.

Removal of Norman H. Davis is advisable if the Roosevelt administration is to retain popular approval of its foreign policy.

Davis, a holdover from the Hoover Administration, is exercising great power, committing the American people to intervention in Europe and the Far East, drawing us into the League, pledging blood and money for future combat.

His long association with the House of Morgan, brought to light by the Pecora probe, makes his present position embarrassing to the administration.

A man is needed at Geneva who will not be under the slightest suspicion of serving two masters. Rightly or wrongly, Davis will be suspected.

In his inaugural address President Roosevelt promised to drive the "unscrupulous money changers out of the temple."

It is now all too evident that his administration can succeed only insofar as it carries out that pledge.

DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have in my hand an article published in the Kansas City Times of May 12 with reference to veterans' hospitals. It is as follows:

THIN OUT THE VETERANS—"NEW DEAL" IS EMPTYING SOLDIERS' HOME BARRACKS—RIGID RULES FORCING HUNDREDS TO PACK UP AND LEAVE—PUTS HEAVY LOAD ON CITY OF LEAVENWORTH

By the Star's Own Service

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., May 11.—Sherman's army marched to the sea and the boys in khaki went "Over There" with a song on their lips, but veterans now are marching out of the military home here with a shrug and the destination of nowhere. The home rapidly is being emptied of its occupants by the new Government economy move and barracks and streets are empty where veterans formerly grouped themselves in the day.

A staff of 14 doctors is working speedily to examine all the men in the home, in order to complete the work in accordance with the new-deal regulations. Since they started some 2 weeks ago, approximately 500 out of the 2,300 men normally in the home have packed their few possessions and joined the army of the unemployed.

When the examinations are completed it is expected that more than 1,000 men will have gone. The new orders are severe and far-reaching. Thus far only one man has made an official objection to being ejected from the home, but left after he was informed that if he refused to give up his bed it would be necessary to call the sheriff.

RULES ARE NOT ELASTIC

In order to remain, the veteran must have 75 percent or more disabilities. He also must have suffered these disabilities in actual war-time service. By this ruling there were 230 peace-time soldiers who automatically were turned out. Of this number 75 were ambulatory cases, needing hospitalization, suffering from tuberculosis or other ailments making it impossible for them to obtain employment.

In order for a man to have domiciliary care he must have had 90 days' active war-time service and be almost totally disabled. Many men are going out under this ruling.

The majority of the men are penniless that are affected by this order and as a result constitute a serious problem for the local community. Red Cross officials, the American Legion, and the local chamber of commerce are trying to find means to provide for them temporarily but lack funds. It is estimated that between $4,000 and $5,000 would be necessary to purchase tickets on half-fare rates to get these men to their local home area.

MANY ARE HOMELESS

Only 4 percent of the peace-time men being let out draw pensions, thus aggravating the condition. Many of them are cases of epilepsy and tuberculosis that need immediate care. Many have no homes to go to and are taking to the open road.

With the proposed opening of the new million-dollar hospital and the arrival yesterday of 5 doctors and 14 nurses transferred here from Kansas City the situation becomes even more acute. This increased the Government pay roll there some $42,480 and there is some doubt expressed that even if the new hospital opens there will be enough men to fill it to its 754-bed capacity.

There are many isolated cases showing the seriousness of the situation. One man, 78 years old, who served two enlistments, but both in peace time and who had been a resident of the home 15 years, was let out by this order. His buddies tried to raise enough money to send him to the national home in Washington, D.C., but expressed doubt he would be admitted.

The local post of the Legion held a burlesque show at the home Monday night. Chorus girls, who had been playing in Kansas City, came here and put on the show on a 25-percent basis to raise money to help the stranded men on their way. Now police are seeking two men who are said to have left with the receipts, $200.

I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, an article from the Washington Evening Star under the headline "Hurls Brick Through Window So He Can Go to Jail and Eat", the story of a veteran who did that very thing, who was in such a hopeless situation that he threw a brick through a window just so he would be arrested and sent to jail in order that he might get fed; also, an article by Nelson Pombles, of 1408 Fairmount, Middletown, Ohio, with reference to war-incurred injuries; an article with reference to the suicide of a veteran in Jackson, Ky., 60 years of age; another pathetic incident of the same kind, the suicide of a 42-year-old veteran, who was ill, living in Hicksville, Ohio; and then, finally, an article under the heading "Government to Withdraw Help. Ohio Soldier's Home Must Get $40,000 Elsewhere or Reduce Population."

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D.C., May 20, 1933]

HURLS BRICK THROUGH WINDOW SO HE CAN GO TO JAIL AND EAT—CLAUDE M. NIELSON, HUNGRY VETERAN, ARRESTED FOR DESTROYING GLASS IN NATIONAL GUARD ARMORY

The prospect of eating regularly caused Claude M. Nielson, 36, of Dayton, Ohio, to go into police court today with the fervent wish that he would be sentenced to jail.

Nielson, a World War veteran, was so anxious to go to jail, according to police, that he tossed a brick through a window yesterday in order to force an officer on duty nearby to place him under arrest.

The policeman, F. E. Kenney, sixth precinct, reported he was standing on the corner of Sixth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue "covering" the bonus parade when Nielson walked up and asked:

"How much time would I get if I smacked you on the nose?"

"You wouldn't go to jail if you smacked me", Kenney replied, "you'd go to a hospital."

Nielson hesitated a moment, then said:

"Well, that's out. How much time would I get if I broke a window?"

"Well, that all depends", was the answer.

Then, according to information given Capt. William E. Holmes, first precinct commander, Nielson picked up a brick and threw it through a window of the National Guard Armory, on the corner.

"O.K.", he said, smiling. "Go ahead and arrest me."

Col. Peyton G. Nevitt, of the National Guard, who had witnessed the brick-tossing, charged Nielson with destroying private property, and the veteran was taken to the first precinct.

"What would you do if I should refuse to file a complaint against you?" Colonel Nevitt inquired as Nielson was being booked.

"Why, I'd just go out and break a bigger window", was the answer. "I'm hungry and broke, and I want to go to jail."

Nielson told the police, they said, that he recently was dismissed from a veterans' hospital in Dayton, in accordance with the new Economy Act, restricting hospitalization to ex-service men disabled in active service.

In police court today the judge asked Nielson whether he wanted 30 or 60 days. He replied, "30 days", and got 30.

WAR-INCURRED INJURIES

To the EDITOR OF TIMES-STAR:

During the past several months I have read numerous items appearing in the public press and various magazines concerning veterans' legislation. It was my impression that the drive of the National Economy League was for the purpose of discontinuing payments of benefits to those veterans who acquired disabilities subsequent to discharge from the World War. The numerous articles on this subject specifically state that it was not desired to reduce benefits that were being paid to veterans on account of combat wounds received on the firing line. With the approval of the recent economy bill, further press items indicated that it would also be necessary to reduce payments for combat wounds approximately 20 percent as an emergency measure in order to maintain the credit of the United States.

When I volunteered and enlisted in the military service, January 18, 1918, I was married; consequently sacrificed my home to serve the Nation in time of stress. I was assigned to Company F of the Sixteenth Infantry as sergeant, and served overseas in engagements at Soissons and St. Mihiel. On September 12, 1918, I was severely wounded in the arm, resulting in a compound fracture and atrophy, and was also wounded in both legs and severely gassed. It was necessary that I remain under constant treatment in the hospital for more than 3 months. I was honorably discharged January 22, 1919, and since that time have been a patient in numerous hospitals on account of my war-incurred disabilities.

The Veterans' Administration has considered me to be permanently and totally disabled on account of such combat wounds, partial blindness, and resulting shock to my nervous system; and at this time I am receiving an allowance of $100 per month. The recent press notice indicating that claims of this type were to be reduced 20 percent was evidently misunderstood by me, as the letter I have just received from the Veterans' Administration states that I will no longer receive the $100 per month after July 1 but will be reduced to $20. It therefore appears that the reduction was reversed and the 20 percent is to go to the veteran and the 80 percent retained by the Government. The new rating of $20 is based on the same medical data as the former rating and includes only combat impairment.

With the former allowance my family has been able to exist without the aid of charity, but with the pittance now awarded me it will be necessary that I seek aid from local charity for existence. I am, of course, unemployable for any purpose, and it does not seem fair to me to place the responsibility of my support on the local community, when my service was rendered in protecting the entire Nation. I am not asking remuneration for any social loss or for the physical suffering my wounds have caused me; but I do feel that the Nation is obligated to me for an existence.

Would any of the proponents of such legislation desire to exchange their lot for mine?

NELSON POMBLES,
1408 Fairmount, Middletown, Ohio.

WAR VETERAN, 60, ENDS LIFE

JACKSON, KY., May 11.—Funeral services were held today for Andrew J. Powell, 60 years old, Spanish-American War veteran, who ended his life last night by firing a pistol bullet into his heart. He had been in ill health and despondent over fear of losing his pension.

HICKSVILLE VET KILLS HIMSELF—EARL HENLY, 42, HAD BEEN ILL

HICKSVILLE, OHIO, May 14.—Earl Henly, 42, of Hicksville, committed suicide here this morning by shooting himself through the heart. His body was found next to a tree in the Hicksville fairgrounds by George Getrost. Ill health was given as the reason for his act.

Henly was a World War veteran and had gone to Great Lakes Naval Hospital at Chicago yesterday, where he failed in an attempt to receive Government medical help, according to a report here. He served overseas during the war in the Air Service.

He left a note to his mother, Mrs. Eva Henly, with whom he resided, requesting that no military funeral be held for him. He also informed his mother as to where she could locate his war-service papers. Before the war Henly worked for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad in Garrett and in Pittsburgh, Pa. His wife died 5 years ago.

Funeral services will be held at the home of the mother Tuesday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock. Burial in Forest Home Cemetery here.

GOVERNMENT TO WITHDRAW HELP—OHIO SOLDIERS' HOME MUST GET $40,000 ELSEWHERE OR REDUCE POPULATION

Withdrawal of financial support the Federal Government heretofore has extended to the Ohio Soldiers' and Sailors' Home at Sandusky will force the State welfare department to seek $40,000 from some other source, according to Welfare Director John McSweeney.

The Federal Government order suspending payments to the home is effective July 1. For a number of years the Government contributed $10 a month for each inmate in the institution. Records of the welfare department show that in 1931, the latest year for which figures are available, the Government contributed $43,000 to the home, instead of the expected $90,000.

The State legislature has been asked for an appropriation of $218,000 for the institution for 1933 and a similar amount in 1934. If additional funds are not forthcoming, McSweeney asserted, it will be necessary to reduce the population of the institution.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I want to put into the RECORD some statements with reference to the general railroad situation. I am opposed to the passage of this so-called "railroad bill", and I am opposed to it because of the fact that I think the approach to the subject of railroad legislation is entirely wrong.

I was very much surprised to hear the statement made by the Senator from Washington to the effect that the railroad men themselves were in favor of it. I am sure that the railroad men of my State and of the Northwest generally are not in favor of it, notwithstanding the fact that there may be some of the heads of the railroad organizations who do favor it.

I want to read portions of a statement made before the Committee on Interstate Commerce by Donald Richberg, who is recognized as one of the leading authorities upon the subject of railroad legislation, and, in my judgment, is one of the ablest lawyers in the United States. He made the following statement:

> The organized railway employees oppose the program embodied in S. 1580 and H.R. 5500, because it provides a mechanism of false economy which will seriously reduce transportation service for the public, will deprive from 50,000 to 300,000 employees of work, will not permanently improve railroad operations or railroad credit, will retard economic recovery, and will promote policies that will work infinite harm to the public interest. The fact is now made plain in the testimony of the sponsors of the bill that substantially all of the powers conferred in this bill that can be practically exercised are to be exercised either directly by or under the control of the coordinating committees selected by railroad management. The bill, therefore, enthrones only an infant czar under the regency of railroad managers.
> The railway labor organizations during the period of the development of this legislation protested in vain against the theories which seem to underlie it. They pointed out that a choice must be made at the outset between preserving a generally competitive system or establishing a monopoly system. They insisted, and now insist, that if we can no longer pay the price of competitive waste in order to obtain the benefits of competitive initiative and efficiency, then we should face the fact that we cannot compromise with partial competition and partial monopoly; that a private monopoly of a public service is intolerable; and that when we accept the necessity of monopolizing transportation we are accepting the ultimate necessity of an ultimate governmental transportation service.
> In the proposed bill the Congress is considering an effort to accomplish the impossible—to bring about a consolidation of railroad operations whereby less transportation service will be furnished but more money will be made.

That is exactly what is being sought in this particular bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. The thought which I entertain at present in regard to the pending bill is that there is no economy to be secured by the passage of the bill unless it is to be secured by withdrawing from the public certain railroad advantages through consolidation, and so forth. What I would like to have the Senator explain, and what I would like to have the Senator who is in charge of the bill explain, is what is expected to be gained by the passage of this bill.

So far as the saving which was anticipated from the dismissal of employees is concerned, that is not to take place, and I think that is correct; but if it is true that no saving is to be secured or had by reason of employing a lesser number of people, then I can see no benefit to be derived from the bill, unless it be through a reduction of facilities of railroad transportation in certain parts of the country, especially of the West.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say this to the Senator: When the question of the consolidation of the railroads of the Northwest came up before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I opposed it, and, speaking to one of the officials of one of the great railroads of that section, I said to him: "How much money do you expect to save?"

He said, "We expect to save about $10,000,000 a year."

I said, "How do you expect to save it? Is it not a fact that you will have to make that saving in two ways, one by cutting down the service rendered to the people of the Northwest, and by dispensing with certain trains, and not only by dispensing with certain trains, but by eliminating practically entirely some of the communities out there, and keeping a great many of the communities from receiving practically any service whatsoever from the railroads? And, in the second place, do you not expect to make the saving by laying off a large number of employees?"

He said to me, "That is correct."

I said to him, "Can you promise me that if you make those savings, that $10,000,000, by laying off employees, and by cutting out the service now rendered to the people of that Northwest section, you will give any lower freight rates or passenger rates to the people?"

He said, "Of course not."

I propose to show, Mr. President, by figures just exactly what it would mean to the Northwest, and how it would mean that the railroads are going to lay off employees. While this bill on the face of it proposes to leave the employees in substantially the status in which they are at the present time, or somewhat in that status, nevertheless it means cutting down or laying off employees, even under the bill as amended by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any effective provision in the bill by which we could deal with the question of the capital structure of a railroad?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think there is a thing in it by which we could deal with the capital structure of a railroad. If there is, the chairman of the committee will correct me.

Mr. BORAH. Whatever saving would be had, then, would be by reason of the reduction of the number of employees, or by curtailing transportation facilities to different parts of the country?

Mr. WHEELER. That is all.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator referred to me, and I want to say that I think there are a great many savings which could be made by the standardization of equipment. One man stated $100,000,000 a year could be saved through the standardization of equipment of these railroads, which could be enforced by the coordinator, which would never be agreed to by voluntary action on the part of the railroads themselves.

Mr. WHEELER. That is not the question.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from Idaho was asking whether there was any other saving from any other source which could be effected, and I say I think there is along the line I have suggested.

Mr. WHEELER. There is no saving that can be made, under the terms of the pending bill, by having them cut down their capital structure.

Mr. DILL. The bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not approve a loan unless it finds that the financial structure of the railroad is such that it can continue.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, but that is not any cutting down of the capital structure.

Mr. DILL. That will result in cutting it down. They must cut it down.

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all. There is no provision in the bill that cuts down the capital structure, or gives anyone power to cut down the capital structure, or authorizes the coordinator to ask them to try to cut down the capital structure.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is no power under the Constitution for a coordinator, an official of this Government, to compel a railroad, just because he does not approve its structure, to cut it down; but if they come to borrow money the Government agency can make that as a requirement. We cannot give anybody power under the Constitution to compel a railroad to cut down its capital structure.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course not. In answer to the Senator from Idaho, let me say to him that there are possible ways in which the railroads can make some savings without laying off any considerable number of men; but there is no question at all, because the coordinator himself made the statement before the committee, that the principal way in which they intend to make the saving is by laying off men.

Mr. DILL. There is no coordinator now.

Mr. WHEELER. The man whom we expect to be appointed coordinator, let me say. I think everybody concedes that he will be the man who will be named. I will say Mr. Eastman, then, made the statement; and of course the railroad officials all make the statement that the principal way they expect to make savings is by eventually laying off men, and if they cannot do that, then they cannot make any considerable savings.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator that Mr. Gray, of the Union Pacific, said that he did not think the coordinator could cut more than 10,000 men from the rolls, even if he had the power; and we have taken away the power.

Mr. WHEELER. I will show what they will lay off on the Northwestern Railroad.

Mr. President, before taking up some of the statistics I have here, I want to read further from the statement of Mr. Richberg. He said:

> In the proposed bill the Congress is considering an effort to accomplish the impossible; to bring about a consolidation of railroad operation whereby less transportation service will be furnished but more money will be made; to bring about greater concentration of private control, fostering monopoly, while at the same time attempting to increase public control; to deflate capital and labor drastically in a great essential industry, while at the same time promoting a program of inflation and economic recovery.

On the one hand, we are talking about putting men to work, giving employment to a large number of people, and are also talking about deflating our currency and bringing back the prices of commodities, and, on the other hand, we are talking about deflating the railroad employees in this particular bill.

Mr. Richberg says:

> We do not believe that such an effort can succeed. We believe that such a legislative measure is fundamentally unsound, but we will not content ourselves with a general opposition to this proposal, recognizing that it has behind it the encouragement of the administration and believing that its political sponsorship is well-intentioned but ill-advised; that it is actuated by high purposes which, however, cannot be realized through this legislation.

Let me say to the Senate that I think I know the feeling of the railroad brotherhoods with reference to this bill. I think I am safe in saying that they have felt that they possibly had to take this bill, because they thought it was going to be passed, regardless of whether they wanted it or not, and consequently they asked for some amendments. They are now put in the position, of course, of having to take it or perhaps get something worse. I do not believe that is the correct position for labor to take, because I think that not only should we protect labor in the bill but that we should protect the general public in the measure, those who are at present being served by the railroads of the country.

Mr. Richberg further said:

> Therefore, we shall seek to point out inadequacies in the bill as drafted to carry out the purposes of the bill as they have been defined. We will present our comments in the form of proposed amendments, and, in explaining the need for such amendments, it may be possible not only to demonstrate the weaknesses in the bill as drafted but perhaps we may also be able to demonstrate the fundamental unsoundness of this method of attacking the railroad problem. Before presenting these amendments in detail it may be well to summarize them in order that the committee may understand that all our amendments fit into certain principles and policies which we believe should be written into any legislation of this character. We propose amendments largely to express clearly our ideas, without any assumption that these are expressed in the best form for legislative use.

Mr. President, this morning I called attention to some of the facts and figures with reference to what has been going on in the railroad world since 1920 and I particularly want to call attention to this fact.

> Perusal of the table on page 5, entitled "Fixed charges and dividends, class I railways" reveals how the railway bondholders and stockholders have been faring ever since 1920, and especially since the crash of 1929. Fixed charges (interest on funded and unfunded debts and rents for leased roads) increased by over $105,000,000, from 1920 to 1931, and dividends increased by over $58,000,000. Both items together increased by approximately $164,000,000, 1920 to 1931.
> The greatest amount—

I should like to have the Senate realize the significance of these figures—

> The greatest amount ever disbursed in the form of fixed charges was in 1929, totaling a little less than $689,000,000, while the largest sum ever disbursed in dividends was in 1930, amounting to nearly $510,000,000.

The largest sum that was ever disbursed by the railroads of this country in dividends, I repeat, was in the year 1930, after the crash, when they paid out $510,000,000.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator. Let me call attention to this fact, because statistics bear it out, that in the years 1927, 1928, 1929, and 1930 some of the railroads of this country, in order to boost the prices of their stocks upon the stock market, in order to unload their stocks, got into the hands of certain speculators. The management were speculating with the roads. What did they do? They reached in and took out of the surplus money with which to pay dividends in order that they could boost the stock by making a good dividend showing, and unload them upon the public. So after the crash came, even in 1930, they paid the greatest amount of dividends that they had ever paid in the history of the United States. Then on their knees they came down here to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and said to the people of the United States, "We have got to have money; if you do not give us money, the banks and the insurance companies of the country will all go broke."

Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The amount the Senator has mentioned as having been paid out in 1930 was in dividends on stock and did not include interest on the bonds?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Both items combined, fixed charges and dividends, were the largest in the history of the railways in 1930. By 1931, the year of growing uneasiness over the financial stability of the railways, the curtailment in dividends and fixed charges only amounted to $187,000,000, or 15.7 percent. Against this it will be noted from the following table on page 6 that total railway income (out of which dividends and fixed charges are ultimately met) declined from 1920 to 1931 by approximately $397,000,000, or 30.9 percent, which is twice as much as the decline in fixed charges and dividends.

(4) The next table on page 6, entitled "Selected income items and ratio of total dividends declared to net income, class I railways, etc.", tells an even more striking story. It will be seen from this table that, with the exception of 1921, the total amount of dividends declared each year from 1920 to 1930, inclusive, was less than the net income.

I want to emphasize that statement, and will read it again:

It will be seen from this table that, with the exception of 1921, the total amount of dividends declared each year from 1920 to 1930, inclusive, was less than the net income.

I quote further:

The largest amount in dividends since 1920, namely $506,625,000, was declared in 1930, the year immediately following the crash of 1929, and this despite the fact that the net income for 1930 fell by $372,900,000 from the 1929 figure.

In other words, Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that their net income fell off $372,000,000, they paid in 1930 the largest dividends that were ever paid in the history of the railroad business in this country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. To what may be attributed the marked decline in railway operating income for the period to which the Senator has just referred?

Mr. WHEELER. It was the general crash and the general collapse of business throughout the country, because a similar condition occurred after 1920; the railroad business declined at that time with every other class of business in the United States. I think that the railroad business, as a matter of fact, has stood up better than most other industries throughout the country, because, as we all know, in many of the large industries there has been an almost total shut-down, with a complete loss of earning power.

But I return to the document from which I was quoting:

Thus during 1930, and in face of the decline in net, the total dividends declared actually increased over the 1929 figure by $16,500,000, and approximated the net income for 1930 by 97 percent.

It next appears that the net income for 1931 again fell from the preceding year (1930) by $389,146,000. This decline is even larger than the decline from 1929 to 1930. But no corresponding reductions in dividend disbursements took place. Dividends merely declined from the high of 1930 by $176,474,000 or less than one half the corresponding decline in net income. As a result it now develops that the total amount of dividends paid out in 1931 were almost 2½ times as great as the net income for that year. In other words, the amount of dividend disbursements for 1931 actually exceeded the net income for 1931 by almost $200,000,000.

To be accurate, the amount was $195,389,000 in actual cash.

That shows, Mr. President, it seems to me, quite clearly what has been wrong with the railroads of this country. They have actually been paying out of their capital during these years in some instances almost twice as much as they were actually earning. Now they are coming to the Congress of the United States, or, rather, some of the bondholders are coming to the Congress of the United States, and, in order to make up to their depleted treasuries the amount which they have paid out in dividends during these years, when they ought to have been conserving their resources in order to keep the roads going and to keep their men employed, are asking us to throw out of employment—for that is what they want, and if they have their own way they will throw them out of employment—anywhere from 50,000 to 300,000 men from one end of this country to the other, and thereby further add to the great number of unemployed and further add to the deflationary movement that has been going on in this country since 1929.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I should like to remind the Senator that there is not anything at all to prevent them from throwing men out of work if they desire to do so right now. If we shall not pass this bill, there will be nothing to prevent their going ahead and throwing out of employment all the men they want to discharge.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course not, but if we pass this bill, Mr. President, and take out the labor provisions—and that is what the railroads want—there will be many men added to the ranks of the unemployed; and let me remind the Senator that when this bill shall pass and the consolidations and combinations of the great railroads in his State take place, he will find as a reaction that the small merchant and the little home-owner in all the cities of the State of Washington, as well as from one end of the country to the other, will demand that the Government of the United States maintain a transportation system as it was prior to the passage of this measure.

I want to say that I am not going to vote for this bill, because I know what it means. I know, Mr. President, it means that the service of the railroads in the Northwest is going to be cut down, and I know what it is going to mean to the railroad men of the country. I say this is the very worst time to throw men out of work; it is the very worst time to cut down the service; and there is not any necessity for it. If the railroads had not paid out unjustifiable sums in dividends in order to maintain the prices of their stocks upon the stock market, there would not have been any necessity to throw railroad workers out of employment and cut down on the service rendered the people. The trouble has been not with the management of the railroads so far as the actual managing of the roads is concerned, not in the wages that have been paid as a great many people say, but it has been the fact that the railroads of the country have been the football of Wall Street speculators who have actually boosted and lowered the stocks of the railroads on the stock markets for their own gain.

By whom are the railroads controlled? Does anybody think they are controlled by a few stockholders? Does anybody think the railroads today are controlled by any one except two or three large banking houses? Who controls them? The house of Morgan controls a large portion of the railroads. Kuhn-Loeb & Co. and other brokers and bankers in the city of New York are today the dominating factors in the railroad business. They move the railroad presidents around just like so many men upon a chessboard. That is what is happening. The railroads are not being managed by their managers. They are not being managed by the presidents of the railroads. They are being run in the interest of speculators who have controlled them for their own selfish interests and because of the fact that they were making money out of managing and running the railroads, the only means of transportation that we have had until recently.

The railroads complain of the competition of motor trucks. They complain because they have lost freight and passenger business. The reason why they have lost it is not just because of the fact that they have had this competition, but they have been guilty of letting the competition grow because of the high freight rates asked. Those high freight rates have let the motor trucks come in and take the freight business away from the railroads. The railroads have maintained their rates too high. They have not given the people the kind of service that they were entitled to have.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Has the Senator from Montana placed in the RECORD statistics showing the discharges of railroad workers since 1920?

Mr. WHEELER. I have them here and intend to do so before I conclude.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I was going to request the Senator to do so if he had not already given the figures.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator from Montana indicate if there is anything in the pending bill by way of economy except the discharge of labor and the turning out of labor so that they must of necessity find other avenues by which and through which they may sustain themselves? That is one question. I want to propound another, because I do not care to interrupt the Senator from Montana again. I am entirely in accord with his views. Is there anything in this measure that even indicates that those who have in the past received and who now receive the higher emoluments coming from the public will be at all reduced in that respect?

Mr. WHEELER. I am very glad to answer the Senator's question. In the first place, I will give the Senator the estimates of savings to result from unification of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific systems. Under this bill, if a coordinator is appointed, we will have unification of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railroad Cos. I understand that these estimates were given by the railroads themselves. I ask that these tabulations may be inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Estimate of savings to result from Great Northern-Northern Pacific unification

[From pp. 47 and 48 of Interstate Commerce Commission Finance Docket No. 6409]

Many of the economies here mentioned are thought by the protestants to be possible without unification of the carriers (p. 49).

Change proposed:	Expected annual saving
Rerouting of traffic by shorter lines	$1,536,328
Use of Rosebud coal on Great Northern between Casselton, N. Dak., and Spokane, Wash	2,282,157
Diversion of passenger trains from Prairie to Port Defiance line (one example of possible savings in routing passenger trains)	27,300
Transportation of ballast (one example of possible savings in hauling material)	20,409
Hauling treated ties between Spokane and Ellensburg, Wash	6,950

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, it will be seen from these records that the largest saving anticipated will have to come out of labor. It will have to come out of the cutting down of service that is rendered at the present time to the people of that section of the country. What is true with reference to that section of the country is bound to be true of practically every other section of the country.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I interrupt only for this observation. By his last statement the Senator has answered the question I desired to propound, because from the reports from which he has read and from a review of the whole bill, it is entirely comprehensible that the only economy is to come from the turning out of employment of those who are now employed.

While I am on my feet I am going to ask the learned Senator from Montana whether or not in the last few days he has been visited by any of the heads of the four brotherhoods and whether or not they are supporting this measure? In that connection I want to say that today I had a visit from the national heads of the brotherhoods, during which they indicated to me that this bill should be supported. In view of the fact that its enactment into law will mean the turning out of employment of a number of men which has been variously stated to me at from 100,000 to 300,000, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he can reconcile that fact with the fact that the national heads of the brotherhoods are supporting such a measure?

Mr. WHEELER. The brotherhoods have not said anything to me about it, but let me say to the Senator that I do not believe they favor the bill, except that they are afraid if they do not take this one they will get something worse. No doubt some of them feel perhaps it is the lesser of two evils. I read a moment ago a statement of Mr. Richberg before the Interstate Commerce Committee, pointing out that it is unsound in principle and that we are going about it absolutely in the wrong way. Some amendments were proposed. One amendment that was proposed is to try as best we may to preserve the status quo of labor at the present time. That was approved by the committee, and they are in hopes that by the adoption of that amendment there will not be from 50,000 to 300,000 men laid off.

My own judgment about the matter, as I pointed out a moment ago, is that the railroads of the country during the past few years, during 1928, 1929, and 1930, paid out in dividends the largest sums that they have ever paid out in dividends, and they paid them out of surplus funds rather than out of earnings. In some of the years previous to that time the railroads actually were paying out these dividends instead of setting aside a reserve to meet conditions such as have arisen. They were actually paying out dividends in order to boost their stocks on the stock market.

Then what happened? After they had nearly wrecked the railroads, they came to Washington and sent out propaganda throughout the United States and pleaded in the name of savings banks and widows and orphans and policyholders. I am going to point out before I get through how that propaganda was without any foundation because of the fact that the earnings of the savings banks and the amount of money they received as earnings on those bonds was a very small percentage of their earnings. The same is true of the earnings of insurance companies from those sources.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is aware that I have an amendment which I am going to propose, which also has the endorsement of all the railroad brotherhoods, and which would, if adopted, actually give a large amount of employment to those who are now out of work.

Mr. WHEELER. I am frank to say to the Senator that if the Senator's amendment is adopted I think it would be the most fundamental thing that could happen in the passage of this bill; and I am heartily in favor of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WHEELER. I do.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not know that my question is entirely apropos to the Senator's thought. If it is not, I do not care to urge it; but is it not true that this proposed measure, if it goes through, will set aside the rule of seniority that has prevailed, and likewise the rule of mileage in the way of payment that has prevailed under the rule of seniority?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not so understand it.

Mr. DILL. No, Mr. President; it cannot do that, because under the Railway Labor Act they are protected.

Mr. WHEELER. They are protected. Some of the railroad men have contended that if we should have a 6-hour law it might cut down the wages of some of the engineers; but with reference to that let me call the Senator's attention to this fact:

The philosophy—and I think it is a true philosophy—of labor organizations has always been to shorten the hours, and when the hours are shortened wages take care of themselves, because when there is a large amount of unemployment in the country no organization, however strong it may be, can for a very long period of time keep up wages; but if the hours are shortened and there is more or less of a shortage of labor, wages always go up in proportion and in accordance with the demand for labor, as the Senator knows. Some labor men, however, have erroneously, I think, taken the view that to shorten hours meant to lower their wages, and they were opposed to it for that reason. That is a very short-sighted policy, in my humble judgment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state to the Senator that they are not opposed to the amendment I am offering. It has the unanimous endorsement of all the railroad brotherhoods, including the engineers, according to the statement they made to me yesterday afternoon.

Mr. WHEELER. I am very happy, indeed, to learn that they have come together and agreed upon it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I know that to be true.

Mr. WHEELER. I come back now to the question of income and dividends:

The decline in net income for the first 9 months of 1932 continues. In fact, there is no net income at all. Instead there is a net deficit of $167,851,000, which it is estimated will increase to $200,000,000 by the end of 1932. Yet in the face of this deficit, up to the end of September 1932 the railway companies in the aggregate have declared dividends amounting to $67,834,000.

Concurrently with these developments railway employment has been steadily curtailed since 1929, and in 1931 a movement was launched which for the year 1932 provided the railway companies with a financial contribution out of the wages of the employees estimated at $200,000,000 annually. This contribution took the form of a 10 percent pay-roll deduction and went into effect February 1, 1932. According to the railways, this help from their employees was necessary in order to maintain the financial integrity of the companies.

We have been receiving so much misinformation in this body with reference to some of these questions that I felt it was necessary to take up some time in order to get before the Senate of the United States the actual facts concerning the railroads and what they have been doing.

But what in essence this $200,000,000 pay-roll deduction now amounts to, considered in the above light, is a reimbursement of the railway companies for the false optimism and unwarranted extravagance manifested by their boards of directors ever since the crash of 1929.

In other words, Mr. President, by reason of the fact that the railroads paid out in dividends, from their surplus funds, over a half billion dollars when there was actually a deficit, they then asked the railroad employees to take a cut of 10 percent. They laid off, as the figures I showed you this morning demonstrated, about one third of their employees, as I recall the figures given here, in addition to the $200,000,000 cut. Now we are proposing to give them authority to unify the roads, to cut out services, to have an absolute monopoly under Government sanction, and to release them from the operation of section 15a of the Railway Labor Act. If we do that, if we take out the labor provisions that have been put into this bill, particularly, and do these other things, watch the stocks of the railroads of this country jump up on the stock ticker, because then they will have practically an absolute monopoly. They will be able to throw out of employment numerous men. They will be able to cut out the service rendered to the various communities of this country.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The $555,000,000 dividends on stocks that were paid in 1929 came out of the net operating income, which was $1,322,000,000 more in 1929 than in 1920.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And that increase in net operating income came from $785,235,000 that was saved on pay-roll reductions, due to the laying off of 361,000 employees.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So those dividends came out of the funds that were saved by laying off labor.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course; and the bondholders have been down here seeking to get this legislation passed, and they have been doing it in the name of the widows and orphans that have their money in the savings banks. They have been doing it in the name of the insurance companies. Before I get through I am going to take up the insurance companies and show just how much money they have invested in railroad bonds, and how it affects their income, by giving the actual figures to the Senate of the United States.

Instead of husbanding their resources, the railway companies disbursed them with a lavish hand in the form of dividends. Had these disbursements since 1929 been kept in the same relation to net income as prevailed during 1928 and 1929, namely 54.7 percent, then the railways would have saved themselves $476,000,000 up to the end of 1931. Thus it would not have been necessary to come to the employees for a hand-out of $200,000,000 to help keep them solvent during 1932.

A lot of these railroad men, as a matter of fact, when their conferences were going on in Chicago, were looked upon almost as being unpatriotic when they did not want their wages reduced; and yet, Mr. President, the railroads continued to pay dividends when they were running a deficit, and they knew they were running it.

Nor would it have been necessary to neglect maintenance during this same period so that the railways today are in the worst condition physically they have ever been in. And finally the evils of railway employment would have been appreciably mitigated.

(5) How the relative position or share of railway labor in the total proceeds of the railway industry has fared since 1920, is recorded by the next table, page 7, entitled "Relationship between total income, pay roll, and fixed charges and dividends to one another, class I railways, 1920–31." First it will be noted that railway labor's share in the form of total wage payments declines progressively up to 1929, despite the growing prosperity of the industry. Since 1929, owing to falling off in gross revenues and other income the employees' portion of total income tended to rise again. On the whole, however, their share remained constant within fairly narrow limits.

This does not hold true for railway capital's share of the proceeds of the industry. This share has tended to increase steadily, showing the highest percentage in 1931, namely 22.2 percent. Compared with 1920, capital's relative share of the total yearly income has almost doubled. This is a striking fact in itself, but it is even more striking to recognize that ever since 1929 capital's relative share has increased from 17.8 to 22.2 percent. This same story is told in another way by the ratio of fixed charges and dividends to pay rolls. This too shows a steady improvement in railway capital's share of the total income as compared with the returns to railway labor. This tendency is not healthy, nor fair to labor.

(6) The tables on pages 8 and 9 deal with the loans authorized and advances made to the railways by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Railroad Credit Corporation. By the late fall of this year the railways became indebted to the United States Government to an extent approximating $350,000,000, which, together with the relief granted them over the same period by the Railroad Credit Corporation, totals nearly $400,000,000. Add to this the $200,000,000 pay-roll deduction provided by railway labor and it appears that the railways of the United States will have benefited in the 12 months ending January 1933, at the expense of the public and labor by a sum amounting to nearly $600,000,000. And all this primarily to safeguard interest payments on railway securities. In passing it should be noted that this sum of $600,000,000 is almost equal to the sum total of the fixed charges for which the railway industry stands liable at the moment.

(7) Finally the table on page 10, showing railway securities owned or controlled by all railways of the United States, records that from 1921 to 1930 there has been a steady decline in the percent of these securities pledged for loans and other purposes, thus apparently improving the borrowing capacity of the railways by 1931. In all probability the necessity for borrowing funds from various sources, especially in 1932, has affected this picture materially so that the situation today is substantially different than it was at the end of 1930. Furthermore, the decline in market value of these securities has also been a factor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I had been called away from the Chamber, and I wanted to ask the Senator from Montana whether he had referred to the present-day values of the railroads of this country as shown by their market quotations as of this date?

Mr. WHEELER. I have not.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator intend to refer to them?

Mr. WHEELER. I think I have the figures here, and if I have, I will refer to them. If I do not have them here, they are at my office. But I do want to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, these tables which were furnished me by Mr. Oliver, of the railroad men's organization, showing, first, the investment in road and equipment, material and supplies, and cash, of railways of the United States, class I, from 1920 to 1931.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WHEELER. I want to call attention to these figures. In the year 1920 the total dividends for the class I railroads were $271,731,669. In 1921 the total dividends jumped from that figure to $400,731,878. In 1922 they went back again to $271,573,751. In 1923 they jumped up again to $346,500,000 in round figures. In 1924 they were $320,000,000. But in 1926, the period when stock prices began to boom, what do we find? We find that they jumped them up from $344,000,000 to $405,000,000. In 1927 they jumped up to $497,933,000, so that they were almost $500,000,000 in 1927. In 1928 they were $430,677,000, and in 1929, when the crash came, they were $490,125,000. In 1930, after the crash, they boosted their dividends to $506,624,000.

The increase in their fixed charges in 1931 over 1920 was $105,000,000, the increase in dividends in 1931 over 1920 was $58,000,000, making a total increase in their fixed charges of $163,931,000.

They paid in 1931 out of their surplus $250,000,000. Out of their surplus in 1930 they paid $334,000,000, and in 1929 they paid $228,000,000, in 1928 they paid $182,000,000, in 1927 they paid $257,000,000, all out of the surplus, in order to pay dividends.

I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a table showing the fixed charges in dividends of class I railroads in the United States for the calendar years from 1920 to 1931 and the first 9 months of 1931 and 1932.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Increase.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, it is an extremely interesting study to notice how the total pay roll charged to operation has increased. For instance, in 1920 the total pay roll charged to operation was $3,424,075,109, and the total fixed charges and dividends for that year were $834,932,000. In other words, the ratio was about 47.3 percent to 11 percent. But in the year 1929, the total pay roll had dropped from the figure I have just given to $2,674,085,566 and the total fixed charges and dividends to $1,178,855,495.

In 1930 it again jumped to $1,186,013,696, while during all that period of time the charges for railroad labor had constantly been going down.

There are some interesting figures given from this source, a statement of amounts allocated to various purposes for which loans to carriers have been approved by the Commission to and including September 30, 1932—loans approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They approved bond interest of $65,882,234 and a total of $332,019,194.

I am going to ask that that table be inserted in the RECORD, likewise a table showing the loans made to railways by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as of October 31, 1932.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I want to call attention to these statements, which I feel are very accurate, made by Mr. Oliver, in which he says:

The demand for reductions in railway wages from its very beginning has been based largely upon the claim that unless net railway earnings could be substantially increased, the savings deposits and the life-insurance policies of millions of Americans were endangered. This claim became definite and explicit while the railways were before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for rate increases, and later, when the campaign shifted to the program for wage reductions, a Nation-wide propaganda was carried on to convince the country that only through railway wage cuts could the safety of life-insurance companies and savings banks be assured. The effectiveness of this propaganda cannot be doubted. The National City Bank of New York, in its December 1931 review of economic conditions, summed up the impression which had been created:

"It has become increasingly clear, as the autumn has come and almost gone without traffic increase or gain in earnings, that reduction of railway wages is inescapable. * * * The savings of the country are more generally invested in railway bonds than in any other bonds except those of the United States Government, and any general impairment of their security through indefinite continuation of present conditions would have serious consequences to society. There is reason to think that the country generally is taking this view."

Mr. President, we all know, of course, that when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was passed here in the Senate, it was whispered around the cloakrooms, and even stated upon the floor of the Senate, that it was necessary for the Government of the United States immediately to come to the rescue, or, if they did not, our savings banks were going to fail and our insurance companies were going broke.

I read further from Mr. Oliver's statement:

In the July 1931 issue of its review the National City Bank had said:

"* * * It appears that institutions which manage funds owned by considerably more than half the population of the country hold between them six and seven billions of dollars of railway securities alone, out of a total of $11,050,000,000, face value, outstanding. It is evident that a decline in the value of these bonds has widespread effects. * * * In the case of bank investments, if market depreciation results in an impairment of the capital of the institution, such impairment must be made good or the institution may be closed."

Whenever the railroad companies of this country have asked for increased freight rates, or increased passenger rates; whenever they have asked for a reduction in the wages of the railway employees; or whenever they have asked for loans from the Government of the United States, the cry has always been the same. They have done it, Mr. President, in the name of the widows and orphans who had their money in the savings banks; they have done it in the name of the poor workingwoman who has put aside her life savings in some form of insurance policy; and then the claim is made that if we do not come to their rescue the poor widows and orphans are going to starve and the orphans will be thrown out on the streets.

During the hearings upon the request of the railways for rate increases, in July 1931, a committee representing life-insurance companies and mutual savings banks intervened in the proceeding, stating that the existing situation, "unless corrected without delay, may lead to losses which would injure the interests of their policyholders and depositors, respectively." The committee, called an "emergency committee"— represented 187 savings banks and insurance companies, holders of $3,498,244,505 of railway bonds. It claimed also that institutions of the character it represented held, in total, $4,700,000,000 of railroad bonds. These are the institutions whose campaign for wage reductions has created the impression that the interests of policyholders and depositors demand that railway labor must accept reductions in wage rates.

It is that same group, that same crowd, that is here at the present time, and are lobbying around here and in the hotels, asking for legislation similar to this, in order that they may make savings, because of the fact that it is claimed that such savings are necessary in order to safeguard the bondholders.

To test the validity of the arguments advanced by these institutions and their advocates, an investigation of the financial condition of the life-insurance companies and savings banks has been made. An answer was sought to the question, "Does the maintenance of railway wage rates threaten the security of life-insurance policies and savings-bank deposits?" An analysis has been made not only of the condition of life-insurance companies and mutual savings banks as a whole, but also of the situation of the largest of the companies individually.

They are contending, Mr. President, that unless they be allowed to lay off something like 250,000 men, and throw them out of employment, the life-insurance companies and the bondholders are going to suffer tremendous losses; but never once have they had in mind the terrible effect of throwing onto the streets 250,000 men, who have followed the same employment for 20 or 25 years, destroying their homes, forcing their wives and children to go without sufficient food, and compelling their children to go without proper schooling.

The only thought is of interest upon bonds and dividends upon stocks. The human element hardly ever, it seems, enters into the breasts of some of these bondholders and stockholders. It seems that the longer we sit here in the Senate the more we are called upon to legislate for that class of people and that class of people alone. Let me say to you, Mr. President, without fear of contradiction, that the Congress of the United States has got to stop legislating simply for the bondholders and the bankers and the railroads of this country, for if it does not there will be a new group of Representatives in the House and a new group of Senators in this body who will not be thinking of doing anything except to legislate for the people out on the farms and for those who are being thrown out of work.

This study shows clearly and beyond doubt that neither the deposits in mutual savings banks nor the policies of those insured in American life-insurance companies are threatened because of the existing railway situation. The history of both types of institutions shows them to have been growing rapidly and to have been accumulating substantial surpluses, in addition to paying increasing dividends. Current income has been far in excess of the demands made upon it, and not even the possibility of a heavy decline in the value of the railway bonds held by these companies would endanger their depositors or policyholders. Individual companies, perhaps, less wisely managed than the group as a whole, may encounter difficulties because of the general investment situation, but railway bonds have proven themselves to be among the most dependable of the investments of financial institutions, and the decrease in their market value of the high-grade issues has been slight.

The facts upon which these conclusions are based are presented herewith.

LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Railroad bonds appear in the books of life-insurance companies in two different places. First, they are included among the assets of the companies, and, second, the interest upon them is included in the income received. If it is true that the condition of the railway industry threatens the security of life-insurance policies, it must be in one of two ways; either the actual or possible decrease in market value of the bonds must threaten to reduce those assets below the possible demands of policyholders upon them, or else the possible loss of income upon railway bonds must threaten the companies with lack of current funds to meet current demands. If neither of these calamities is possible, then it cannot truthfully be said that the policyholder is endangered by current low net earnings of the railways. It would follow also that the interests of the policyholder do not demand wage reductions for the purpose of increasing net railway revenues.

Railroad bond holdings represented by the "emergency committee" totaled $3,498,244,505; the 55 insurance companies represented held $2,547,253,047 in railroad bonds. (Table A.) Twelve of the fifty-five companies held $2,390,720,419 of these bonds—93.9 percent of the total of all insurance companies represented. These 12 companies held approximately 80 percent of the total held by all life-insurance companies. An examination of the relation between railroad bonds and total assets, and bond interest and total income has, therefore, been made not only for all life-insurance companies but also for these 12 large companies individually.

THE INCOME OF LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Total income on railroad bonds held by life-insurance companies is not separately reported. If we assume an average return on railway bonds held of 4.5 percent (analysis of investment returns made by E. T. Halaas indicates this percentage to be accurate), the total income from that source in 1931 for American life-insurance companies would have been $135,000,000. As a test of the statements relative to the security of policyholders, we may put the impossible extreme case; how would the income of insurance companies have been affected if every dollar of this total had been withheld? Would the companies have been able to meet the claims of policyholders in 1931 if they had not received any income from railroad bonds?

How extreme this assumption is can be judged by several letters from the presidents of life-insurance companies, appearing in the December 1932 issue of the Railroad Trainman. These letters, received by the insurance department of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, show that only a very small percentage of railroad bonds held by the companies—an amount that is really negligible—is in default or arrears. Railway revenues and traffic seem to have hit bottom; they will hardly go below 1932 lows. The assumption of wholesale defaulting, therefore, is wholly outside the range of possibility. The analysis made upon that basis is allowing more than could conceivably be claimed by those who urge railway-wage reductions in the interests of life-insurance policyholders. In 1931 the total income of 342 American life-insurance companies was $4,850,375,950. (Table B.) Their income from railway bonds was consequently only 3 percent of the total income.

Putting the danger far beyond its maximum, therefore, and assuming that the losses to these companies would be $135,000,000, if no railroad bond in 1931 had paid a cent of interest the income of these companies would have been reduced 3 percent to $4,715,375,950. Would this income have met the claims of policyholders in 1931?

The total disbursements to policyholders by life-insurance companies in 1931 were $2,606,551,153. (Table B.) Income therefore, even had there been not one cent received from railroad bonds, would have been 80 percent greater than disbursements to policyholders.

Mr. President, I ask that the remainder of this statement, on pages 45, 46, 47, and 48, may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Total disbursements of life-insurance companies, including all expenses, commissions, etc., as well as payments to policyholders, were $3,537,704,954 in 1931. If the companies had received not one cent of interest on their railroad-bond holdings, their income would still have exceeded total disbursements by $1,200,000,000, a margin of 33 percent.

Total life-insurance premium income in 1931 was $3,661,105,385. If the companies had been deprived of all income other than premium income, they would still have been able to meet all expenses, including death claims, dividends, and all other payments to policyholders.

These figures show the situation for life-insurance companies of the country as a whole. In order to develop the situation of the companies who are represented upon the "emergency committee" the 12 largest of them may be given separate consideration.

The largest of these 12 companies, from the point of view either of assets or holdings of railroad bonds, is the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. In 1931 the total income of this company was $907,093,871; (table C) its income from railroad bonds is not definitely ascertainable, but can be calculated to be between $31,250,000 and $31,500,000. Taking the latter figure, interest on railroad bonds amounted to 3.5 percent of the total income of this company for 1931.

If the Metropolitan had received not one dollar from its railroad bonds, its income would have been $875,593,871. Payments to policyholders in 1931 totaled $459,680,242. Without any income from railroad bonds, therefore, Metropolitan income would have been $416,000,000 more than was required for all payments to policyholders, including dividends.

Total disbursements of the Metropolitan for 1931 were $630,218,877. With no income from railway bonds, the company would still have had a margin of $245,000,000 after meeting all expenses, as well as all payments to policyholders.

Total premium income of the Metropolitan in 1931 was $722,110,565. If all other sources of income had failed in that year—Government bonds, State and municipal bonds, mortgage loans, railroad bonds, etc.—premium income alone would have been sufficient to pay policyholders' claims, meet all expenses, and leave a margin of nearly $100,000,000.

There is not the slightest foundation for any claim that the income upon railroad bonds was necessary to avoid defaulting upon amounts due to policyholders. Railroad-bond interest is lost in the huge total income of the Metropolitan Insurance Co. In the absolutely impossible contingency of a complete failure of all railroads to pay interest upon their bonds, the policyholders of the Metropolitan would receive a somewhat smaller dividend upon their investment, but the security of their policies would still be impregnable.

What is true of the Metropolitan is true of these other 11 companies individually and of them all collectively. The 12 had annual income in 1931 of $3,160,295,033 (table D). Their income from railroad bonds may be safely calculated at not more than $105,000,000, 3.3 percent of the total.

If the income from railroad bonds had completely failed, therefore, these 12 companies would have still had an income of $3,055,000,000. Payments to policyholders by all 12 companies in 1931 amounted to $1,715,591,293. These companies, with no income from railroad bonds, could have paid all claims of policyholders and had a margin of more than $1,300,000,000. Their total disbursements, including commissions, expenses, etc., were $2,332,132,124. Without railroad-bond interest their income would have exceeded these disbursements by more than $700,000,000. Premium income of the 12 companies in 1931 was $2,398,313,117. If the companies had had no income other than that from premiums in 1931, they would still have been able to cover all disbursements actually incurred, with a margin of over $66,000,000.

The ability of insurance companies to cover all premium and other disbursements from premium income alone is not just a characteristic of the year 1931. Mr. S. H. Nerlove, associate professor of economics of the University of Chicago, in an address before the 1931 annual meeting of the American Economic Association said:

"What is even more striking is that the premium income (i.e., the total income less investment income) for all companies has usually outrun the expenditures. The annual aggregate total expenditures of all companies have varied from 80 percent to 101 percent of the aggregate premium income between 1904 and 1930. * * * Consequently, not only can the value of the securities fluctuate adversely but the amount of income obtained from these investments can vary to some extent without dangerously impairing the ability of the average life office to meet its dollar obligations, if we do not take account of legislative requirements." (See table M.)

The income from railroad bonds held by life-insurance companies, while large in the aggregate, is very small relative to the total income of those companies. Even a complete failure of the income from such bonds would leave the security of the policyholders unaffected; the huge margin of income over disbursements, even excluding railroad-bond interest, is complete assurance that the demands upon the life-insurance companies from their policyholders will be met whatever may happen in the railway industry.

Objection may be taken to this comparison of current income with outgo on the ground that it makes no allowance for loans to policyholders, which have increased greatly during the last 3 years. Because of the practice of most insurance companies of permitting policyholders to borrow upon their policies, it is necessary that enough cash be available to meet demands for such loans.

In 1931, which may be regarded as an extreme year in respect to policy borrowings, the life-insurance companies licensed to do business in the State of Connecticut (which includes practically all of the larger companies) reported an increase in policy loans and premium notes of $469,318,508 (annual reports of Connecticut insurance commissioner, 1931 to 1932). Funds made available through maturing of investments in real-estate mortgages and bonds of these companies may be estimated at $450,000,000 (estimated on basis of annual maturities of 2 percent of bonds and 5 percent of real-estate loans. See article by S. H. Nerlove, Journal of Business, University of Chicago, December 1932). Income for the year exceeded disbursements by more than $1,000,000,000; with income from railway bonds of these companies totaling not more than $150,000,000, it is clear that the problem of providing funds for premium notes and policy loans in 1931 was by no means difficult.

ASSETS OF LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Taken alone, the statement that American life-insurance companies hold $3,000,000,000 of railroad bonds seems to indicate that the security of those companies is wholly involved in the security of their railroad investments. As a matter of fact, the total assets of these life-insurance companies are more than $20,000,000,000; investment in railroad bonds, as of December 1931, was only 16.2 percent of assets of such companies (table E).

From a standpoint of the security of their principal, railroad bonds have a very wide range. A large proportion of the bonds are secured by first mortgages upon main lines, or equally dependable prior liens upon other railway facilities. At the other extreme, a considerable proportion of railroad bonds are overlying securities whose value depends much more upon maintenance of railway earnings than does that of the higher grade bonds. The effect of changes in the railway situation upon the insurance companies depends, therefore, upon the type of securities held by the insurance companies.

An analysis made by Mr. E. T. Halaas, of the School of Commerce of the University of Chicago, of the investments of two leading life-insurance companies as of December 31, 1930, show the ratings of their railroad bonds to have been these:

Number of bond issues

Company	Total R.R.	Number rating
		AAA	AA	A	BAA	BA	B
Mutual Life, New York	234	116	66	30	15	5	2
Equitable	355	182	108	42	18	5
Both companies	589	298	174	72	33	10	2
Percent of total	100	50.6	29.5	12.2	5.6	1.7	3

The Mutual Life Insurance Co., of New York, has a larger proportion of its investments in the form of railroad bonds than any of the principal life-insurance companies of the country. It may be safely assumed that its selection is fairly representative of the companies as a whole; combined with the Equitable, the distribution may be taken as even more nearly representative of the general condition.

Wholesale receiverships in the railway industry, which are certainly not to be expected, would have a serious effect upon the value of junior railroad securities. The effect upon the high-grade securities would be much less. Considering the character of railroad bonds held by the insurance companies, it would seem that a maximum depreciation of 25 percent in the value of their railroad holdings is the very worst that might be expected to result from any possible contingency.

To what extent will the policyholders be jeopardized if such a shrinkage actually should result?

Estimating the total value of railroad bonds held by the life-insurance companies to be $3,000,000,000, the 25 percent possible loss would be $750,000,000—approximately 4 percent of the total value of their assets. Could the insurance companies survive such a loss in the value of those assets?

As of December 31, 1931, the gross surplus of 342 life-insurance companies totaled $1,972,524,790 (table B). This surplus had grown from $743,027,000 as of December 31, 1920, and from $1,233,933,000 as of December 31, 1925.

If, in 1931, the insurance companies had been compelled to write off the maximum possible loss with which wholesale railroad receivership of the railroads might threaten them, the effect would have been to reduce that surplus to what it was in 1925. This surplus is in addition to all reserves required to meet policy liabilities; it has been accumulated from the excess income of each year after the payment of dividends; its use to meet losses due to shrinkage of value of assets is proper and regular.

During 1931 the assets of the insurance companies increased $1,280,000,000. Since 1920 they have increased $12,200,000,000 (table B). Even in the worst conceivable contingency in the railroad industry, the insurance companies might have increased their assets by half a billion dollars in 1931, and by eleven and a half billion in the last decade, after absorbing whatever loss the railroad industry might have occasioned.

Complete railroad collapse in 1931, therefore, would have meant only a scaling down of the accumulated surplus of the life-insurance companies, possibly a curtailing of the dividends—which amounted to more than half a billion dollars—paid in that year to policyholders.

To give the impression that the railroad situation in any way threatened the security of life-insurance policies is a complete misrepresentation of the facts.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I now wish to call attention to the facts as to the mutual savings banks. I read as follows:

MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS

Of the total of railroad bonds listed by the emergency committee as represented by it, $950,991,458 were held by the 187 mutual savings banks included (table A). The committee claimed that the total value of railroad bonds held by mutual savings banks in the country as of June 30, 1931, was $1,700,000,000; however, the report of the Comptroller of the Currenly shows that as of June 30, 1931, the 600 mutual savings banks had total investments in railroad and other public-service corporation bonds of $1,365,324,000. Railroad bond holdings of these banks probably total not more than $1,100,000,000. The income from these bonds is not separately reported; at the rate of 4.5 percent it would amount to $49,500,000.

Assuming the complete failure of this item of income of the mutual savings banks, what would have been the effect upon those banks in 1931? According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, the 600 mutual savings banks increased their surplus in 1931 by $69,250,000 (table I). This, of course, was after the payment of all dividends. The increase in surplus during 1930 was over $75,000,000 (table J). The total increase since 1920 has been $635,000,000.

Failure to receive the income from railway bonds—all the railway bonds held by them—would still have left these mutual savings banks in 1931 with a substantial net to close into their surplus account. Such a total failure of the interest on railway bonds is inconceivable, but if it should have happened in 1931 these banks would have been able to pay all interest due depositors and all other expenses and still have increased their surplus by $20,000,000.

Mr. President, what becomes of the argument that it was necessary to pass the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and permit the railroads to reach their hands into the Public Treasury of the United States of America in order, as it was said, to save the savings banks and the insurance companies of this country? What becomes of the argument we hear so frequently made upon the floor of the Senate and in the lobbies and the propaganda which is being sent out by the banks and the insurance companies and through the little chambers of commerce to the effect that, first, if the Government of the United States does not increase freight rates for the railroads; secondly, if it does not cut the wages of railway employees; third, if it does not throw a lot of them out of employment and upon the streets, with their wives and children; and, fourth, if it does not open up the Treasury of the United States and let them reach their hands into the public coffers, the widows and orphans of this country are going to suffer, because the money of the savings banks and the insurance companies is in railroad bonds?

Laws regulating mutual savings banks are even more strict than those controlling life-insurance companies; it is certain that the general quality of the railroad bonds held by mutual savings institutions is at least as high as those held by the insurance companies. Assuming, however, that a situation might arise that would result in general railway receiverships, the value of the railway bonds held by these banks might decline in value by 25 percent. The loss sustained might reach $300,000,000 under those circumstances.

The surplus accumulated by mutual savings banks in the United States has increased by $335,000,000 since 1925—and during much of that time depositors were being paid at an increased interest rate. If, then, the banks had been forced to write off $300,000,000 loss upon their railroad bonds, the total surplus for all mutual savings banks would have been cut to $668,000,000—$35,000,000 above the actual 1925 figures and $300,000,000 above the 1921 surplus.

The security of the depositors in these banks would not have been in any way endangered; the margin of safety would still have been more than ample. And the dimensions of the hypothetical calamity assumed are, of course, far greater than anything that might reasonably have been feared.

The same conclusions hold with respect to the mutual savings banks represented by the "emergency committee." Of the total railroad-bond holdings by those banks, $458,619,184, or 51 percent, were held by 12 banks.

Reports on all of these institutions are not available on the same basis. Ten of them, with railroad-bond holdings of $405,000,000, had total resources on December 31, 1931, of $2,396,000,000 (table K); the bonds were 16.9 percent of their resources. Assuming again an average interest of 4.5 percent on the railroad bonds, the income upon them in 1931 would have been $18,225,000. The gross earnings of these banks were $112,225,000 in 1931 (table L), and their net—after payment of dividends to depositors—was $19,334,523. Even assuming a complete failure of interest payments in 1931, these 10 banks would still have had a surplus on the year's operations.

On December 31, 1931, these 10 banks had an accumulated surplus of $267,031,627 (table K). The wholesale receivership assumed in estimating the worst possible effect of railroad difficulties if it reduced the value of railroad bonds held by these banks by 25 percent would reduce the surplus from $267,000,000 to $165,000,000. If such an outcome resulted in 1931 it would not have imperiled the savings deposits of those having accounts with these 10 banks.

The cry which went up from the "emergency committee", and was echoed from subservient agencies over the country, had as little genuine foundation with reference to mutual savings banks as it had had with reference to life-insurance companies. Neither the depositors in mutual savings banks nor the policyholders of life-insurance companies were, or are, endangered even should the railroad situation have developed the most severe crisis conceivable.

One other factor which deserves consideration in this connection is that the creation of a feeling of insecurity in the minds of depositors and policyholders is not only indefensible from the point of view of the general economic welfare, but that it is also most unprofitable to the financial institutions joining in the production of such a panic. The cost to banks and insurance companies of their propaganda for railway-wage reductions, in terms of policies cashed in and deposits withdrawn, is not determinable, but it must have run into many millions of dollars since the wage-cutting campaign was launched.

GENERAL CONDITION OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS REPRESENTED BY "EMERGENCY COMMITTEE"

The demand of the institutions represented by the "emergency committee" that they should be protected against financial loss even at the expense of railroad workers invites a consideration of their profits and their recent growth.

The demand for a 10-percent deduction from wages of railway workers would have meant, at 1931 pay rolls, $200,000,000; with reduced forces, the effect of the deduction for 1932 will probably be less than $150,000,000.

The surpluses of mutual savings banks and insurance companies realized in the depression year of 1931 were $150,000,000. At a time when they were earning such profits, the largest in their history, these financial institutions were bringing pressure to bear upon railroad managements to reduce pay rolls, and were creating the impression, unjustifiably, that their depositors and policyholders were being jeopardized by railway conditions.

During the 10 years ending December 31, 1931, the wealth controlled by life-insurance companies rose from eight to twenty billions of dollars; in the preceding 10 years their assets had risen only four billions. In terms of percentages, the wealth controlled by these companies increased 100 percent from 1911 to 1921, and 150 percent from 1921 to 1931.

Resources controlled by mutual savings banks grew from $3,650,000,000 in 1910, to $5,619,000,000 in 1920, and $11,191,000,000 in 1931, an increase of less than 60 percent in the first 10 years, and practically 100 percent in the next 11 years.

Together, these banks and insurance companies controlled $7,500,000,000 in 1910, $13,000,000,000 in 1920, and $31,000,000,000 in 1931.

Surplus of mutual savings banks increased at the rate of $8,500,000 per year between 1910 and 1920, and at the rate of $57,000,000 per year between 1920 and 1931.

Life-insurance company surpluses increased at the rate of $25,000,000 per year between 1910 and 1920, and at the rate of $125,000,000 per year between 1920 and 1931.

The increasing control exercised by these and related institutions over the industry of the Nation is indicated by the fact that 52 life-insurance companies, which in 1921 held 17 percent of the bonds of American railways, in 1930 held 23 percent of such bonds. In 1906 these companies held only 12 percent of the bonds of our railways. If to these totals are added the increase in holdings by other insurance companies and by mutual savings banks it will be clear that in a very short time actual domination of the industry will have passed to such interests.

Mr. President, I ask to have placed in the RECORD tables A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, and M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended to talk upon this subject, but I wanted at least to get in, the RECORD some authentic data showing the falsity of the propaganda that has been spread from one end of the country to the other by bankers in New York who actually control the railroads, by the bondholders and by others who are mulcting the public through the raising of railroad rates and the cutting down of wages, and are reaching right into the public coffers of the United States. I appreciate the fact that it will have very little effect in this Chamber, but I wanted to have the data in the RECORD so that those who are interested in the subject may have an opportunity to turn to some authentic data, particularly those on the outside who take the trouble to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. President, I am going to vote against the bill unless it contains a provision for the 6-hour day. Unless the Black amendment is adopted, I propose to vote against the bill. That amendment was offered in the committee and was voted down. I think the time is come when we should adopt the universal 6-hour day in this country. The one place that it can be adopted where we know it will be constitutional is on the railroads of the country engaged in interstate commerce. The one place where we can make a test to see how it is going to work is on the railroads.

Let me say to any railroad man who fears that perhaps his wages may be decreased temporarily, that the correct philosophy always is and always has been that when labor is scarce wages go up, and when men are walking the streets wages are bound to go down in the long run regardless of any labor organization.

This bill is going to put the stamp of approval upon railroad monopolies in the country. If it is carried into effect, as I have every reason to believe it will be, it is going to upset economic conditions in the Northwest to a tremendous extent. It will absolutely and completely ruin various communities in the Northwest. Not only that, but it will work untold hardship not only upon the employees themselves but upon the business men and those who depend upon the great transportation systems of the country for service.

I think it is a backward step. I think it is a wrong step. I think it is a deflationary step in the face of statements repeatedly made that the thing we ought to do, instead of deflating, is to inflate. I think it is an unwise policy that is about to be pursued by the Government, because if there ever was a time in the history of the country that we should not deflate and carry into effect deflationary policies, this is the time. We should hesitate; we should not do it. For one, I repeat, I shall vote against the bill, at least unless the Black amendment is adopted.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am anxious at this time to take up some of the committee amendments which are not controversial and see if we cannot get them disposed of. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has a speech of some length but has indicated that he would rather not deliver it until tomorrow. For that reason I should like to proceed at this time with the consideration of committee amendments, unless some Senators desire to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, does the Senator expect to pass the bill this evening?

Mr. DILL. No; it will not be possible.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what is the proposal of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. DILL. We have an order to consider amendments of the committee first and then individual amendments will be in order. It is my desire to proceed with the consideration of committee amendments at this time.

Mr. LONG. I do not know that I can be here tomorrow. The committee amendments are more or less formal. I have been in hopes that we might have the Black amendment considered today.

Mr. DILL. I want to consider the committee amendments first, at least those involved in title I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill for committee amendments.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, under the heading "Title I—Emergency powers", on page 1, line 6, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SECTION 1. As used in this title—

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 2, after the word "Transportation", to strike out "for whose appointment or designation the act provides" and insert "hereinafter provided for", so as to read:

(b) The term "Coordinator" means the Federal Coordinator of Transportation hereinafter provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "Committees", to strike out "for whose creation the act provides" and insert "hereinafter provided for", so as to read:

(c) The term "committee" means any one of the Regional Coordinating Committees hereinafter provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 10, to insert:

(e) The term "subsidiary" means any company which is directly or indirectly controlled by, or affiliated with, any carrier or carriers. For the purpose of the foregoing definition a company shall be deemed to be affiliated with a carrier if so affiliated within the meaning of paragraph (8) of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 17, to insert:

(f) The term "employee" includes every person in the service of a carrier (subject to its continuing authority to supervise and direct the manner of rendition of his service) who performs any work defined as that of an employee or subordinate official in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 23, to insert:

(g) The term "State commission" means the commission, board, or official, by whatever name designated, exercising power to regulate the rates or service of common carriers by railroad under the laws of any State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 10, after the name "President", to strike out "with the advice and consent of the Senate or be designated by the President from the membership of the Commission. If so designated, the coordinator shall be relieved from other duties as Commissioner during his term of service to such extent as the President may direct", and insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If appointed from the membership of the Commission, the coordinator shall not by virtue of such appointment cease to be a member of the Commission, but shall be relieved from his duties as Commissioner during his term of service as coordinator to such extent as the President may direct; except that the coordinator shall not sit as a member of the Commission in any proceedings for the review or suspension of any order issued by him as coordinator"; on page 4, line 1, after the name "President", to insert a comma and "and without regard to the Civil Service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended,"; in line 6, after the word "act", to strike out the comma and "and not subject to the Civil Service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended"; and in line 12, after the word "if", to strike out "designated" and insert "appointed", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. In order to foster and protect interstate commerce in relation to railroad transportation by preventing and relieving obstructions and burdens thereon resulting from the present acute economic emergency, and in order to safeguard and maintain an adequate national system of transportation, there is hereby created the office of Federal Coordinator of Transportation, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If appointed from the membership of the Commission, the Coordinator shall not by virtue of such appointment cease to be a member of the Commission, but shall be relieved from his duties as Commissioner during his term of service as Coordinator to such extent as the President may direct; except that the Coordinator shall not sit as a member of the Commission in any proceedings for the review or suspension of any order that the Coordinator shall not sit as a member of the Commis- issued by him as Coordinator. The Coordinator shall have such powers and duties as are hereinafter set forth and prescribed, and may, with the approval of the President, and without regard to the Civil Service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants and agents, in addition to the assistance provided by the Commission, as may be necessary to the performance of his duties under this act. The office of the Coordinator shall be in Washington, D.C., and the Commission shall provide such office space, facilities, and assistance as he may request and it is able to furnish. The Coordinator shall receive such compensation as the President shall fix, except that if appointed from the Commission, he shall receive no compensation in addition to that which he receives as a member of the Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 24, after the word "five", to strike out "members" and insert "regular members and two special members"; on page 5, line 1, after the word "directors", to insert "or its receiver or receivers or trustee or trustees"; in line 3, before the word "members", to insert "regular"; in line 4, after the word "shall", to insert a comma and "subject to the approval of the coordinator,"; in line 6, after the word "operate", to insert a semicolon and "but no railroad system shall have more than one representative on any such committee"; in line 9, after the word "group", to strike out the comma and "subject to the approval of the coordinator"; and commencing in line 10, to insert the following: "The two special members of each committee shall be selected in such manner as the coordinator may approve, one to represent the steam railroads within the group which had in 1932 railway operating revenues of less than $1,000,000 and the other to represent electric railways within the group not owned by a steam railroad or operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation. Each such special member shall have reasonable notice of all meetings of his committee at which any matter affecting any carrier which he represents is to be considered, and may participate in the consideration and disposition of such matter."

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. The Coordinator shall divide the lines of the carriers into three groups, to wit, an eastern group, a southern group, and a western group, and may from time to time make such changes or subdivisions in such groups as he may deem to be necessary or desirable. At the earliest practicable date after the Coordinator shall have initially designated such groups, 3 regional coordinating committees shall be created, 1 for each group, and each committee shall consist of not more than 5 regular members and 2 special members. The carriers in each group, acting each through its board of directors or its receiver or receivers or trustee or trustees or through an officer or officers designated for the purpose by such board, shall select the regular members of the committee representing that group, and shall, subject to the approval of the Coordinator, prescribe the rules under which such committee shall operate; but no railroad system shall have more than one representative on any such committee. In such selection each carrier shall have a vote in proportion to its mileage lying within the group. The two special members of each committee shall be selected in such manner as the Coordinator may approve, one to represent the steam railroads within the group which had in 1932 railway operating revenues of less than $1,000,000 and the other to represent electric railways within the group not owned by a steam railroad or operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation. Each such special member shall have reasonable notice of all meetings of his committee at which any matter affecting any carrier which he represents is to be considered, and may participate in the consideration and disposition of such matter. Members of the committees may be removed from office and vacancies may be filled in like manner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 24, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; on page 6, line 1, after the word "carriers", to insert "and subsidiaries"; and in line 5, after the word "services", to insert "and the charges therefor", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. The purposes of this title are (1) to encourage and promote or require action on the part of the carriers and subsidiaries which will (a) avoid unnecessary duplication of services and facilities of whatsoever nature and permit the joint use of terminals and trackage incident thereto or requisite to such joint use, (b) control allowances, accessorial services and the charges therefor, and other practices affecting service or operation, to the end that undue impairment of net earnings may be prevented, and (c) avoid other wastes and preventable expense; (2) to promote financial reorganization of the carriers, with due regard to legal rights, so as to reduce fixed charges to the extent required by the public interest and improve carrier credit; and (3) to provide for the immediate study of other means of improving conditions surrounding transportation in all its forms and the preparation of plans therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 19, after the word "carriers", to insert "and subsidiaries"; in line 24, after the word "carriers", to insert "or subsidiaries"; on page 7, line 2, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert: "title. Nothing in this title shall be construed to authorize a carrier or carriers to take any action, except when specifically authorized by the coordinator, which is now forbidden by any State or Federal law or by other restraints or prohibitions now imposed upon the carriers under the authority of State or Federal law", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the committees on their own initiative, severally within each group and jointly where more than one group is affected, to carry out the purposes set forth in subdivision (1) of section 4, so far as such action can be voluntarily accomplished by the carriers and subsidiaries. In such instances as the committees are unable, for any reason, legal or otherwise, to carry out such purposes by such voluntary action, they shall recommend to the Coordinator that he give appropriate directions to the carriers or subsidiaries by order; and the Coordinator is hereby authorized and directed to issue and enforce such orders if he finds them to be consistent with the public interest and in furtherance of the purposes of this title. Nothing in this title shall be construed to authorize a carrier or carriers to take any action, except when specifically authorized by the Coordinator, which is now forbidden by any State or Federal law or by other restraints or prohibitions now imposed upon the carriers under the authority of State or Federal law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 9, after "Sec. 6", to insert "(a)"; in line 12, after the word "carriers", to insert "the subsidiaries"; in line 15, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title; and the Coordinator, his assistants and agents, and the Commission, shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda of the carriers and subsidiaries"; in line 19 after the word "committee", to strike out "fails to act" and insert "has not acted"; in line 21, after the word "should", to strike out "act" and insert "have acted", and in line 24, after the word "carriers" to insert "and subsidiaries", so as to read:

SEC. 6. (a) The Coordinator shall confer freely with the committees and give them the benefit of his advice and assistance.

At his request, the committees, the carriers, the subsidiaries, and the Commission shall furnish him, or his assistants and agents, such information and reports as he may desire in investigating any matter within the scope of his duties under this title; and the Coordinator, his assistants and agents, and the Commission, shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda of the carriers and subsidiaries. If, in any instance, a committee has not acted with respect to any matter which the Coordinator has brought to its attention and upon which he is of the opinion that it should have acted, under the provisions of section 5, he is hereby authorized and directed to issue and enforce such order, giving appropriate directions to the carriers and subsidiaries with respect to such matter, as he shall find to be consistent with the public interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 2, to insert:

(b) Insofar as may be necessary for the purposes of this title, the Commission and the members and examiners thereof shall have the same power to administer oaths and require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents and to take testimony by deposition, relating to any matter under investigation, as though such matter arose under the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended and supplemented; and any person subpenaed or testifying in connection with any matter under investigation under this title shall have the same rights, privileges, and immunities and be subject to the same duties, liabilities, and penalties as are provided in the case of persons subpenaed or testifying in connection with any matter under investigation under the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 17, to strike out:

SEC. 7. The Coordinator shall provide means whereby such central committees as may be selected by and represent railway labor organizations in each of the groups shall be advised of any contemplated orders requiring changes in service or operation which will affect the interests of the employees, and he shall confer freely with such committees before issuing any such order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 9, to insert:

SEC. 7. (a) The Coordinator shall provide the means whereby labor committees for each regional group of carriers shall be selected by those railway labor organizations which, as representatives duly designated and authorized to act in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Labor Act, entered into the agreements of January 31, 1932, and December 21, 1932, with duly authorized representatives of the carriers, whereby the current wage payments of the employees of the carriers are determined. It shall be the duty of the regional coordinating committees of management and the Coordinator to give reasonable notice to and to confer with the appropriate regional labor committee upon the subject matter prior to taking any action or issuing any order which will affect the interests of the employees, and to afford said labor committee reasonable opportunity to present its views upon said contemplated action or order.

(b) The number of employees in the service of a carrier shall not be reduced by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title beyond the number as shown by the pay rolls of employees in service during the month of May 1933, nor shall any employee in such service be deprived of employment or be in a worse position in respect to his compensation by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title except to the extent that after the effective date of this act vacancies are created by the death, normal retirement, or resignation of employees, but not to exceed 5 percent in any 1 year.

(c) The Coordinator is authorized and directed to establish regional boards of adjustment whenever and wherever an order of the Coordinator creates conditions that make necessary such boards of adjustment to settle controversies arising out of actions taken under the authority of this title. Carriers and their employees shall have equal representation on said boards of adjustment for the settlement of such controversies, and said boards shall exercise the functions of boards of adjustment provided for by the Railway Labor Act.

(d) It shall be the duty of the Coordinator, and he is hereby authorized in like manner, to provide the means for determining the amount and require the carriers to make just compensation for property losses and expenses imposed upon employees by reason of transfers of work from one locality to another in carrying out the purposes of this title.

(e) Carriers, whether under control of a judge, trustee, receiver, or private management, shall be required to comply with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act and with the provisions of section 77, paragraphs (o), (p), and (q), of the act approved March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 3, to strike out:

SEC. 8. Any order issued by the Coordinator pursuant to this act shall remain in effect until it is vacated by him or suspended or set aside by the Commission, as hereinafter provided, and such order may include provision for the creation and administration of such just pooling arrangements or for such just compensation as he may deem necessary or desirable and in furtherance of the purposes of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 8. Any order issued by the Coordinator pursuant to this title shall be made public in such reasonable manner as he may determine and shall become effective as of such date, not less than 20 days from the date of such publication, as the Coordinator shall prescribe in the order; and such order shall remain in effect until it is vacated by him or suspended or set aside by the Commission, as hereinafter provided, and such order may include provision for the creation and administration of such just pooling arrangements or for such just compensation for the use of property or for carrier services as he may deem necessary or desirable and in furtherance of the purposes of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 22, to strike out:

SEC. 9. Any interested party, whether carrier, shipper, or employee, dissatisfied with any order of the Coordinator may file a petition with the Commission asking that such order be reviewed and suspended pending such review. If the Commission, upon considering such petition, finds reason to believe that the order may be unjust to the petitioner or inconsistent with the public interest, the Commission is hereby authorized to grant such review and, in its discretion, the Commission may suspend the order if it finds immediate enforcement thereof would result in irreparable damage to the petitioner or work grave injury to the public interest, but if the Commission suspends an order, it shall expedite the hearing and decision on that order as much as possible. Thereupon the Commission shall, after due notice and a public hearing, review the order and take such action in accord with the purposes of this act as it finds to be just and consistent with the public interest, either confirming the order or setting it aside or reissuing it in modified form, and any order so confirmed or reissued shall thereafter remain in effect until vacated or modified by the Commission.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 9. Any interested party, including, among others, any carrier, subsidiary, shipper, or employee, or any group of carriers, subsidiaries, shippers, or employees, or any State commission, or the governor of any State, or the official representative or representatives of any political subdivision thereof, dissatisfied with any order of the Coordinator may, at any time prior to the effective date of the order, file a petition with the Commission asking that such order be reviewed and suspended pending such review, and stating fully the reasons therefor. Such petitions shall be governed by such general rules as the Commission may establish. If the Commission, upon considering such petition and any answer or answers thereto, finds reason to believe that the order may be unjust to the petitioner or inconsistent with the public interest, the Commission is hereby authorized to grant such review and, in its discretion, the Commission may suspend the order if it finds immediate enforcement thereof would result in irreparable damage to the petitioner or work grave injury to the public interest, but if the Commission suspends an order it shall expedite the hearing and decision on that order as much as possible. Thereupon the Commission shall, after due notice and a public hearing, review the order and take such action in accord with the purposes of this title as it finds to be just and consistent with the public interest, either confirming the order or setting it aside or reissuing it in modified form, and any order so confirmed or reissued shall thereafter remain in effect until vacated or modified by the Commission.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I was unable to keep up in detail with that amendment. I should like to know whether the amendment has any reference to orders in regard to freight rates.

Mr. DILL. No; this bill in no way gives the coordinator any power over freight rates, or over any kind of rates.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It gives him no power in that particular?

Mr. DILL. Not in that particular.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think, if it would be consistent, we ought to have an amendment placed in this bill on the question of the notice that is given of an increase in freight rates. I was very much surprised not long since, when complaint was made to me in regard to an increase of freight rates on products of my State and of course others, but more particularly my own State, to find that all the company has to do is to file a notice of freight-rate increase, and it becomes effective, I think, within 30 days, or even less. That does not give the shipper or producer any opportunity whatever of a hearing, and the increase automatically goes into effect without any action on the part of the Commission, which I think is an absurd situation so far as the shippers and producers of the country are concerned. I probably shall offer an amendment to this bill to try to correct that.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator wishes to prepare an amendment, he may do so and offer it after the committee amendments have been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 22, after "Sec. 10", to insert "(a)"; in the same line, after the word "carriers", to insert "or subsidiaries"; in line 24, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and on page 14, line 8, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 10. (a) The carriers or subsidiaries affected by any order of the Coordinator or Commission made pursuant to this title shall, so long as such order is in effect, be, and they are hereby, relieved from the operation of the "antitrust laws", as designated in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, and of all other restraints or prohibitions by law, State or Federal, other than such as are for the protection of the public health or safety, insofar as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by such order made pursuant to this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 13, to insert:

(b) The Coordinator shall issue no order which shall have the effect of relieving any carrier or subsidiary from the operation of the law of any State or of any order of any State commission until he has advised the State commission of said State, or the Governor of said State if there be no such commission, that such order is in contemplation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 20, after the word "carrier", to insert "or subsidiary"; in line 21, after the word "carrier", to insert "or subsidiary"; in line 24, before the word "shall", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; in line 25, after the word "carrier", to insert "subsidiary"; on page 15, line 2, after the word "carrier", to insert "subsidiary"; in line 6, after the name "Coordinator", to insert "or the Commission"; and in line 10, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title", so as to read:

SEC. 11. The willful failure or refusal of any carrier or subsidiary or of any officer or employee of any carrier or subsidiary to comply with the terms of any order of the Coordinator or of the Commission made pursuant to this title shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the carrier, subsidiary, or person offending shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $20,000 for each offense, and each day during which such carrier, subsidiary, or person shall willfully fail or refuse to comply with the terms of such order shall constitute a separate offense. It shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the Coordinator or the Commission may apply to institute in the proper court and to prosecute under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this title and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expense of the courts of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 13, after the name "United States", to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this title shall be construed to require any employee or officer of any carrier to render labor or service without his consent, or to authorize the issuance of any orders requiring such service, or to make illegal the failure or refusal of any employee individually, or any number of employees collectively, to render labor or services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 22, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; in line 24, after the word "including", to insert "costfinding in rail transportation"; and on page 16, line 4, after the word "conditions", to insert "and relations", so as to read:

SEC. 12. It shall further be the duty of the Coordinator, and he is hereby authorized and directed, forthwith to investigate and consider means, not provided for in this title, of improving transportation conditions throughout the country, including cost finding in rail transportation and the ability, financial or otherwise, of the carriers to improve their properties and furnish service and charge rates which will promote the commerce and industry of the country and including also the stability of railroad labor employment and other improvement of railroad labor conditions and relations; and from time to time he shall submit to the Commission such recommendations calling for further legislation to these ends as he may deem necessary or desirable in the public interest. The Commission shall promptly transmit such recommendations, together with its comments thereon, to the President and to the Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 13, after "section 2", to insert a comma and "but not including the expenses of the coordinating committees"; in line 17, after the word "carriers", to insert a comma and "and said fund is hereby appropriated for the payment of such expenses"; in line 19, after the word "carrier", to insert a comma and "within 30 days after the date of enactment of this act"; in line 20, after the word "fund", to insert a comma and "for the first year of the operation of this title"; in line 23, after the word "Commission", to insert a comma and "and to pay into said fund within 30 days after the expiration of such year a proportional amount covering any period of extension of this title by proclamation of the President under section 16"; on page 17, line 3, after the word "this", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and in line 10, after the word "agents", to insert "and to the employees of the Commission when engaged in the service of the coordinator", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. The expenses of the Coordinator except so far as they are borne by the Commission in accordance with the provisions of section 2, but not including the expenses of the coordinating committees, shall be allowed and paid, on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Coordinator, out of a fund obtained from assessments on the carriers, and said fund is hereby appropriated for the payment of such expenses. It shall be the duty of each carrier, within 30 days after the date of enactment of this act, to pay into this fund, for the first year of the operation of this title, $1 for every mile of road operated by it on December 31, 1932, as reported to the Commission, and to pay into said fund within 30 days after the expiration of such year a proportional amount covering any period of extension of this title by proclamation of the President under section 16, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to collect such assessments. Any amount remaining in the fund when this title ceases to have effect shall be returned by the Secretary of the Treasury to the carriers in proportion to their contributions. The carriers and the Pullman Co. shall be permitted, anything in the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to the contrary notwithstanding, to provide free transportation and other carrier service to the Coordinator and his assistants and agents and to the employees of the Commission when engaged in the service of the coordinator.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 11, to strike out—

SEC. 14. The commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, nor shall it authorize a carrier to issue bonds or other evidence of indebtedness under the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, unless it shall find that the financial structure of the carrier is such that there is reasonable prospect that such carrier can without financial reorganization survive the existing economic depression and provide for its capital needs thereafter.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 14. The Commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, if it is of the opinion that such carrier is in need of financial reorganization in the public interest: Provided, however, That the term "carrier" as used in this section shall not include a receiver or trustee.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington a question about this amendment. It contains the following provision:

The Commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, if it is of the opinion that such carrier is in need of financial reorganization in the public interest.

I wonder if that does not mean "unless it shall find", instead of "if it is of the opinion."

Mr. DILL. I think not. I think the purpose is to have the Commission look into the financial organization of the carrier, and, if it finds that it is in need of financial reorganization, not to permit it to have a loan.

Mr. ADAMS. That is, it is directly in conflict with the section as it was in the original bill?

Mr. DILL. Yes. The original provision had two objectionable features from the viewpoint of the committee.

One was that it covered the issuance of bonds. The issuance of bonds is under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the present law, and bonds would be issued largely for new construction or new equipment.

The second objectionable feature was the words in line 19, "survive the existing economic depression." That seemed a rather unnecessarily burdensome requirement of the Commission, because nobody can tell what can survive the existing depression, for we do not know how long it may last.

This language was prepared largely through consultation with Mr. Eastman, of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think it probably will be in conference anyway. I think, though, the language was satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 15. Any final order made under this title shall be subject to the same right of relief in court by any party in interest as is now provided in respect to orders of the Commission made under the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended. The provisions of the Urgent Deficiencies Appropriation Act of October 22, 1913 (38 Stat.L. 219), shall be applicable to any proceeding in court brought to suspend or set aside any order of the Coordinator or of the Commission entered pursuant to the provisions of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 12, after "Sec.", to strike out "15" and insert "16"; in the same line, before the word "shall", to strike out "act" and insert "title"; and in line 15, after the word "Coordinator", to insert "or", so as to read:

SEC. 16. This title shall cease to have effect at the end of 1 year after the effective date, unless extended by a proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof, but orders of the Coordinator or of the Commission made thereunder shall continue in effect until vacated by the Commission or set aside by other lawful authority.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II, amendments to Interstate Commerce Act", on page 21, line 23, after the word "provisions", to strike out "As used in this paragraph, the words 'control or management' shall be construed to include the power to exercise control or management" and to insert "As used in this paragraph and paragraphs (7), (8), (9), and (11), the word 'control' and the word 'management' shall be construed to include the power to exercise control or management, whether through ownership of a majority of voting stock or otherwise. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed or taken to ratify, validate, or recognize the validity of any act of any person accomplishing or effectuating or tending to accomplish or effectuate, prior to the enactment hereof, such control or management in any manner forbidden hereby after the enactment hereof", so as to read:

SEC. 202. Such section 5 is further amended by striking out paragraphs (6), (7), and (8) and by inserting in lieu thereof the following paragraphs:

"(4). (a) It shall be lawful, with the approval and authorization of the Commission, as provided in subdivision (b), for two or more carriers to consolidate or merge their properties, or any part thereof, into one corporation for the ownership, management, and operation of the properties theretofore in separate ownership, or for any carrier, or two or more carriers jointly, to purchase, lease, or contract to operate the properties, or any part thereof, of another; or for any carrier, or two or more carriers jointly, to acquire control of another through purchase of its stock; or for a corporation which is not a carrier to acquire control of two or more carriers through ownership of their stock; or for a corporation which is not a carrier and which has control of one or more carriers to acquire control of another carrier through ownership of its stock.

"(b) Whenever a consolidation, merger, purchase, lease, operating contract, or acquisition of control is proposed under subdivision (a), the carrier or carriers or corporation seeking authority therefor shall present an application to the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall notify the Governor of each State in which any part of the properties of the carriers involved in the proposed transaction is situated, and also such carriers and the applicant or applicants, of the time and place for a public hearing. If after such hearing the Commission finds that, subject to such terms and conditions and such modifications as it shall find to be just and reasonable, the proposed consolidation, merger, purchase, lease, operating contract, or acquisition of control will be in harmony with and in furtherance of the plan for the consolidation of railway properties established pursuant to paragraph (3), and will promote the public interest, it may enter an order approving and authorizing such consolidation, merger, purchase, lease, operating contract, or acquisition of control, upon the terms and conditions and with the modifications so found to be just and reasonable.

"(5) Whenever a corporation which is not a carrier is authorized, by an order entered under paragraph (4), to acquire control of any carrier or of two or more carriers, such corporation thereafter shall, to the extent provided by the Commission, for the purposes of paragraphs (1) to (10), inclusive, of section 20 (relating to reports, accounts, etc., of carriers), including the penalties applicable in the case of violations of such paragraphs, be considered as a common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, and for the purposes of paragraphs (2) to (11), inclusive, of section 20a (relating to issues of securities and assumptions of liability of carriers), including the penalties applicable in the case of violations of such paragraphs, be considered as a 'carrier' as such term is defined in paragraph (1) of such section, and be treated as such by the Commission in the administration of the paragraphs specified. In the application of such provisions of section 20a in the case of any such corporation the Commission shall authorize the issue or assumption applied for only if it finds that such issue or assumption is consistent with the proper performance by each carrier which is under the control of such corporation of its service to the public as a common carrier, will not impair the ability of any such carrier to perform such service, and is otherwise compatible with the public interest.

"(6) It shall be unlawful for any person, except as provided in paragraph (4), to accomplish or effectuate, or to participate in accomplishing or effectuating, the control or management in a common interest of any two or more carriers, however such result is attained, whether directly or indirectly, by use of common directors, officers, or stockholders, a holding or investment company or companies, a voting trust or trusts, or in any other manner whatsoever. It shall be unlawful to continue to maintain control or management accomplished or effectuated after the enactment of this amendatory paragraph and in violation of its provisions. As used in this paragraph and paragraphs (7), (8), (9), and (11), the word 'control' and the word 'management' shall be construed to include the power to exercise control or management, whether through ownership of a majority of voting stock or otherwise. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed or taken to ratify, validate, or recognize the validity of any act of any person accomplishing or effectuating or tending to accomplish or effectuate, prior to the enactment hereof, such control or management in any manner forbidden hereby after the enactment hereof.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 12, after the word "of", to strike out "paragraph (6)" and insert "paragraphs (6) and (11)", so as to read:

(7) For the purposes of paragraphs (6) and (11), but not in anywise limiting the application thereof, any transaction shall be deemed to accomplish or effectuate the control or management in a common interest of two carriers—

(a) If such transaction is by a carrier, and if the effect of such transaction is to place such carrier and person affiliated with it, taken together, in control of another carrier.

(b) If such transaction is by a person affiliated with a carrier, and if the effect of such transaction is to place such carrier and persons affiliated with it, taken together, in control of another carrier.

(c) If such transaction is by two or more persons acting together, one of whom is a carrier or is affiliated with a carrier, and if the effect of such transaction is to place such persons and carriers and persons affiliated with any one of them and persons affiliated with any such affiliated carrier, taken together, in control of another carrier.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 18, after "(7)" and the comma, to strike out "and", and in line 19, after "(8)", to insert "and (11)", so as to read:

(9) For the purposes of paragraphs (6), (7), (8), and (11), wherever reference is made to control it is immaterial whether such control is direct or indirect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 14, after the word "association", to insert "joint-stock company", so as to read:

(17). As used in paragraphs (4) to (16), inclusive, the term "person" includes an individual, partnership, association, joint-stock company, or corporation and the term "carrier" means a carrier by railroad subject to this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 24, after the word "amended" and the comma, to insert "and of all other applicable Federal statutes", so as to read:

SEC. 204. The provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and of all other applicable Federal statutes, as in force prior to the enactment of this title, shall remain in force, as though this title had not been enacted, with respect to the acquisition by any carrier, prior to the enactment of this title, of the control of any other carrier or carriers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 20, after "Sec. 206" to insert "(a)", so as to read:

SEC. 206. (a) All moneys which were recoverable by and payable to the Interstate Commerce Commission, under paragraph (6) of section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as in force prior to the enactment of this title, shall cease to be so recoverable and payable; and all proceedings pending for the recovery of any such moneys shall be terminated, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 15, to insert:

(b) The income, war-profits, and excess-profits tax liabilities for any taxable period ending after February 28, 1920, of the carriers and corporations whose income, war-profits, or excess-profits tax liabilities were affected by section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as in force prior to the enactment of this title, shall be computed as if such section had never been enacted, except that, in the case of carriers or corporations which have made payments under paragraph (6) of such section, such payments shall be excluded from gross income for the taxable periods with respect to which they were made. All distributions made to carriers in accordance with paragraph (a) of this section shall be included in the gross income of the carriers for the taxable period in which this act is enacted. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be held to affect (1) the statutes of limitations with respect to the assessment, collection, refund, or credit of income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes or (2) the liabilities for such taxes of any carriers or corporations if such liabilities were determined prior to the enactment of this act in accordance with section 1106(b) of the Revenue Act of 1926 or section 606 of the Revenue Act of 1928, or in accordance with a final judgment of a court, an order of the Board of Tax Appeals which had become final, or an offer in compromise duly accepted in accordance with the law.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this amendment was inserted by the committee at the request of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of covering the income tax sought to be collected. It has been called to my attention that this is a revenue-producing provision, and that the body at the other end of the Capitol might take exception to the bill if it contained that legislation. For that reason I ask that the amendment be disagreed to, because I understand it will be inserted by the body at the other end of the Capitol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That concludes the committee amendments.

Mr. DILL. That completes the committee amendments. I believe the Senator from Alabama desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, between lines 4 and 5, the Senator from Alabama proposes to add a new paragraph to section 7, as follows:

That beginning July 1, 1933, 6 hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees. That pending the revision of existing contracts or the making of new contracts between carriers and their employees (in order to provide for the application of the standard of a day's work hereinbefore provided) in the manner required in the Railway Labor Act, neither existing basic rates of pay nor any other measures of compensation as fixed in existing contracts shall be altered except by written agreement of the contracting parties. But in the absence of such an agreement the provisions of this act shall not be construed to authorize any reduction in the compensation of employees subject to this act.

The act entitled "An act to establish an 8-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and for other purposes", approved September 5, 1916, is not hereby repealed, but the operation thereof is hereby suspended so long as the foregoing requirements of this paragraph shall remain in full force and effect.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, we cannot pass the bill this evening, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] wants to speak in the morning; so at this time I suggest that we might take a recess until tomorrow at 11 o'clock. if that be satisfactory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Alabama, if he will yield for that purpose, I will move an executive session.

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

CAPITAL-GAINS PROVISION OF INCOME TAX LAW

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the New York Times of today entitled "No Real Surprise." The editorial deals with the inconsistency and absurdity of treating capital gains or capital losses as income.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From New York Times, May 26, 1933]

NO REAL SURPRISE

Congress is said to be aghast at the discovery that deduction of capital losses under the law has cut the yield of income taxes in two. Members are now eager to plug that "hole." But its existence was known to everybody—outside Congress. The danger, as well as the absurdity, of treating capital gains and capital losses as income was pointed out years ago. It was from the first a definition of income which no economist of standing would justify. And the results of it have been exactly as predicted. In boom times the tax was reluctantly paid by some, but thousands of people refused to realize their possible capital gains for fear of having to pay a heavy tax to the Government. A consequent withholding of stocks from the market greatly contributed to the frantic "boom" in the market of 1928 and 1929. The income-tax law had removed an automatic brake from the train of speculation thus allowed to run wild. What happened when the evil days came, all can now see. Losses greater than income wiped out the tax.

British taxes are perhaps the heaviest in the world, but British law leaves no such "loophole" as astonished Congressmen now find in our statutes. The difference was quietly explained by Mr. Morgan yesterday. The English income tax does not include either capital gains or losses. Senator BARKLEY thereupon inquired whether, if the British system had been in force here, Mr. Morgan would have paid a tax in 1931 and 1932. "To quite a considerable amount", Mr. Morgan replied, "but I wouldn't have paid as much in 1928 and 1929." That puts the case neatly. From the very beginning our income-tax law was theoretically wrong. Today it has been proved to be in practice a huge blunder.

The Senate investigation has turned up many things which show what a mad world, my masters, financial leaders were making of it during the 2 or 3 years before everything crashed to the earth. But Congress can claim no immunity from the general insanity of that period. The tax laws which it made, and which it refused to alter, were a fit product of men dwelling in a fool's paradise.

FARM COOPERATIVE MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a most remarkable and illuminating address delivered by Hon. J. D. Beck, Commissioner of Agriculture and Markets of the State of Wisconsin, and formerly a Member of the House of Representatives, at Osceola, March 11, 1933, at a combined meeting of the patrons of 39 cheese factories in Polk, St. Croix, and Barron Counties, on the situation confronting the farm cooperative movement in the United States today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As I see it, the farm cooperative movement has met with more stubborn opposition than any other movement of producers in history. Farmers produce the food for all the people, and when the food gamblers are able to reach over into the farmers' pockets and take two thirds of what they produce they are not going to give up that advantage without a struggle, without throwing every obstacle in the way of every attempt of the farmer to get a little more of the things he produces to do with as he pleases instead of allowing two thirds of it to go to food dealers to do with as they please.

According to the Department of Agriculture at Washington, D.C., and the department of markets in New York, there are 4 food dealers for every 7 farms in the United States. In 1927, during so-called "prosperity", these food gamblers paid the farmer on an average $1,200 for what he produced, then turned around and sold it to the consumer for three times that amount, or $3,600. In other words, before the farmer could get what he produced to the consumer he was compelled to pay a tribute to the dealers of about $2,400. Or, turn it the other way around and say, "Before the consumer could get what the farmer sold for $1,200, he had to pay a tribute of $2,400 to the food gamblers." At the present time the farmer receives considerably less than that. Just what sense there is in that I am unable to see. This brings us to the question of what are we to do about it? What can we do about it?

Some advocate organizing to get cost of production plus a fair profit. That may be the solution, though just how such a plan can be worked out I do not know. In attempting to think this plan through I run up against such obstacles as this: According to an article appearing in the Saturday Evening Post some time ago, some capitalists took some of the enormous profits they made out of the war and developed a 57,000-acre farm down in the Texas-New Mexico Panhandle country where they were raising wheat they could sell for 17 cents a bushel and make a profit on it. They had a harvesting machine that cut a swath 86 feet wide, threshes, and sacks the grain. Just how a cost-of-production plan can be worked out as between that farm and another where the cost is $1 per bushel, I am unable to see. I can see that we must have cost of production if we are to survive.

With my limited ability I am unable to figure out how this plan will work, even between adjoining farms. The cost of production on one will differ from the other. The cost in one county will differ from that in another. The same is true as between States. The cost in one year, on a single farm, will differ from that of another year. Besides, I believe I am safe in saying that 6,000,000 of the 7,000,000 farmers in the United States do not know what it costs to produce a single farm product. I only know of one. That one can tell exactly how much it costs him to curry or harness a horse or milk a cow. He can tell how much it costs for his hired man to go from his house to the barn; how much it costs to till an acre of land, raise a bushel of potatoes, or butcher a hog. He can tell how much each farm activity costs, and that these costs differ from year to year.

Denmark, perhaps, has the most highly organized farmers of any country in the world. It started out on a cost-of-production plan. But the obstacles were so great they finally changed to a struggle for a greater share of the things they produced. Even then the obstacles, at times, seemed almost insurmountable. They were refused halls in which to discuss their problems, just as has been done with the farmers in the United States. Their meetings were broken up, just as has been done in this country. They were arrested on trumped-up charges and lodged in jail, just as has taken place here. When this failed, their leaders were banished from the country, and it has only been within the last 8 or 10 years that these exiles were permitted to return to their native land. One of these was found, by a depot agent, living in a little hut in the mountains of Colorado. When the agent told him that the Danish farmers had broadcast to the world that they had won the battle and it was now safe to return, he came to Washington to get the necessary papers to permit him to leave the United States and he described the struggle of the Danish farmers to me. That was while I was preparing a cooperative marketing bill to introduce in the House of Representatives, and his story was a great help in the preparation of that bill.

After various schemes had been tried and failed, an attempt was made to form a Nation-wide cooperative to include all farm products. But they did not have the farm leadership necessary to handle it, so they hired a business man as manager. Future developments indicated that this man had been planted in the organization for the sole purpose of breaking it up, because that is what he proceeded to do. That is, in my opinion, exactly what happened to the Farmers' Equity in Wisconsin. It is what happened to the citrus-fruit growers in California, and I believe that is what happened to the cheese federation.

The next attempt made at cooperation in Denmark was by the butter producers. Farm leadership was sufficient to make this a success. The opposition was not able to plant anyone in this organization to break it up. Failing in that, they started a counterorganization to get the farmers to quarreling among themselves, just as was and is now being done with the Dairymen's League in New York, and just as is being done all over the United States wherever a cooperative seems on the road to success.

Noting the success of the butter producers, the producers of other commodities fell into line and organized similar cooperatives, so that now they are the most highly organized of any farmers in the world. These organizations are tied together at the top by an organization with power to do those necessary things which the commodity organization cannot do or is at a disadvantage in doing. They built from the bottom up, instead of from the top down. They process their own products. They own their banks and factories. The net result has been that, instead of the farmers getting only one third of what they produce, as they once did, and as we do at the present time, they now get over two thirds of what they produce. That may be cost of production, it may be more or it may be less, depending on general market conditions, weather, and so forth. But they have struggled 75 years to accomplish it. Farmers of other European countries who have patterned after Denmark are securing as much as 78 percent of what they produce, and have done so in less than half the time. They have profited both by Danish failures and successes.

The law makes it the duty of the department of agriculture and markets to assist farmers in the organization of cooperative-marketing associations. In the performance of that duty the department will not urge anything upon the farmers of this State except what has been tried and proven successful elsewhere, as well as in Wisconsin. We are not even going to urge that much until we are convinced that farm leadership has been developed necessary to carry it through. There have been enough failures without adding to them.

There is a so-called "farm movement" in this State which proposes to break down every dairy cooperative in it and build something on the ruins, though what that "something" is, no one seems to knew. Whatever it is, it appears to be the same kind of movement that has been used by food gamblers for the last 75 years to break up farm cooperatives. It is exactly the opposite of what the citrus-fruit growers of California did. It is exactly the opposite of what the Danish farmers did, and it is exactly the opposite of what the New England farmers recently did, where they joined together at the top 22 of the 24 dairy organizations in that territory with the immediate result of securing an increase of 49 cents per hundredweight for milk on the Boston market. These farmers went on a strike in order to tie these cooperatives together into one organization. In Wisconsin this so-called "farm movement" struck in order to break up cooperatives.

Let me give you a few of our experiences. The farmers surrounding one of our cities organized a milk-producers' association to bargain with the dealers on price. They had no contract requiring milk to be sold through the organization. Farmers could sell through the organization or direct to the distributors, as they pleased. These farmers produce from 45 percent to 55 percent more milk than is necessary to supply the needs of the city consumers. This is called "surplus milk." The raw milk consume in the city is called fluid, or base milk, and usually sells for more than twice what the surplus brings. To get a better return for the surplus these farmers bought and equipped a creamery and began processing this surplus. This was a failure because of a lack of leadership. I say it failed because of lack of leadership, because the Dairymen's League of New York tried that same thing and made a success of it.

Following this failure the farmers began talking about getting on a contract basis so as to have a better hold on the milk supply. The department approved of this, but we knew exactly what would happen when the farmers of that milk shed succeeded in getting this hold. The distributors would do exactly as the distributors of New York City did with the surrounding farmers. They would accede to the demands of these farmers just long enough to enable them to go outside this milk shed and contract for their milk supply, and then tell the producers of this shed to go to thunder.

To prevent this, the department began urging the farmers around the condenseries of the State to organize so as to control the supply and enable them to get a better price. There are now about 3,300 farmers so organized. We also urged cooperative creameries to form groups among themselves, secure a field man to help them in buying supplies for the whole group, to assist in improving the quality and secure greater uniformity in their product, and to lead them to see that they could not afford to allow themselves to be used to break up the farmers' cooperative surrounding this city. In 7 months we organized enough locals in the State to cover something like 20,000 farmers. We attempted the same thing with the cheese producers and feel that we succeeded to the extent of saving around 130 factories composed of perhaps 3,000 farmers for the federation. Yet, the distributors of the city in question have gone out into the State as far as 150 miles away and bought cream from cheese-factory patrons to the extent of breaking up the factory. They have done the same thing with creameries by buying milk from patrons. They almost broke up a cooperative formed to sell milk on the Chicago market.

Nevertheless, with all these obstacles in the way, we felt we were succeeding very well until up jumps another so-called "farm organization" which, if it has done nothing else, has succeeded most admirably in getting farmers to quarreling among themselves. Farmers in that condition are not in the frame of mind to get very far in cooperative effort.

The Dairymen's League is now having this same experience, and has devised a means to overcome it. If a proposal of any kind is made at any of their meetings that has a single vote against it, that proposal is laid aside and each member is required to take it home, think it over, talk it over with his farm neighbors, and, if possible, devise a better scheme to present at the next meeting. Almost invariably the matter is unanimously disposed of at the next meeting. This has helped to develop the most loyal membership of any cooperative in the country, unless it be the citrus-fruit growers. You may know it is loyal when 3,000 members went out over the State between March and September of last year signing up members for the league, and they did it at their own expense, without a dollar's pay. This brought on new efforts to break it up.

It was charged with running the farmers into debt $17,000,000 and of taking the property of members to pay that debt. It was claimed nonmembers received better prices than members; that the league cuts prices and forces the price of milk downward; that it is extravagant; that it buys plants and shuts them down; that the property it owns is not worth its book value; that it has 13,000 employees; that its officials are corrupt and that they are now trying to borrow money from the Federal Government in the hope of postponing the day of bankruptcy, and when that day comes the league will sell the homes from over the farmers' heads to pay its bills. Every one of these charges has been proven to be absolutely false. Yet you will always find some farmers ready to believe anything. If the league should eventually fail, it will be the fault of the farmers themselves.

For over 10 years the department of markets, aided by the university, the county agents, and the Federal Government, tried to induce our creameries to join Land O'Lakes. During that 10 years 42 Wisconsin creameries did so. During that same 10 years a Wisconsin federation was formed, composed of 86 creameries, leaving 176 cooperative creameries outside of any organized group.

The department, therefore, undertook the building up of local groups of creameries without reference to either the Land O'Lakes or the Wisconsin federation. During the 7 months following September 1, 1931, we organized 3 groups composed of 42 creameries. This leaves 134 cooperatives creameries still outside any organization. We induced as many creameries to form local groups in 7 months as the old department of markets, the county agents, the Federal Government, and the college of agriculture had induced to join Land O'Lakes in 10 years.

But in organizing these groups, there was one thing we could not talk about. We could not talk cooperative marketing. That was the one thing they did not want and that was the one thing they would not have. They pointed to the cheese federation as an example of what cooperative marketing does to the farmers. They pointed to the Mountain States Honey Producers' Association as another example. They pointed to the cherry growers as another. It did no good to suggest that someone may have been planted in some of these organizations for the express purpose of breaking them up. It did no good to tell them that some of these cooperatives may have failed because of mismanagement or because they were not farm owned and farm controlled.

What they wanted and what they were determined to have, if they had anything, was an organization that would help them to produce a higher and more uniform quality of butter which would give them an advantage in bargaining for a price, and that is exactly what the department of agriculture and markets is trying to help them do, feeling certain that the time will come when they will see the necessity of a cooperative-marketing program. At any rate, that is what happened with the Dairymen's League in New York. In 1907 they organized a bargaining association under the laws of New Jersey. The league operated under that plan for 13 years.

During that 13 years the obstacles thrown in their way developed a farm leadership that saw they would have to adopt some other plan if they hoped to attain the desired results, so in 1920 they reorganized into a cooperative marketing association under the cooperative marketing law of the State of New York. It took these farmers 13 years to learn that they were not on the right track. It did no good to tell them they were on the wrong track. That was one thing they had to learn for themselves. Yet I believe these 13 years were the most beneficial of any 13 years of the 61 the league or its predecessors have been in existence. It has developed a farm leadership necessary for successful farm cooperative marketing. We can profit by New York's experience, so that it need not take us as long as it did the farmers of that State. Yet I feel we must take sufficient time to develop a farm leadership which is necessary for success.

One of the groups the department called together to organize into a local listened very attentively to what we had to say and approved the plan presented, but said, "That is a very good plan, but we are in a little different situation from most farmers. Practically all of our dairy products are marketed locally. We do not have to ship these products outside the State, as is true with 75 percent of Wisconsin's farmers. We are thus able to save freight charges, and in the main we get a little better price than outside buyers pay." Nevertheless these farmers went home and began thinking things over. A little later they asked the college of agriculture to send them a man to check over the work of the butter makers to see if there might be some things they could do to produce a better quality of butter, to reduce the cost of fuel and other supplies, and to economize on hauling charges. When this was done they asked for another conference with the department. At this conference a plan for incorporating the group was worked out and a local unit was incorporated under the laws of the State. The next step taken by this unit was to hold institutes for the patrons of their creameries, at which various subjects relating to the creamery industry are discussed. This unit, composed of 12 creameries, is now considering the engaging of a field man to devote his entire time to these creameries and their patrons—from the farms where the raw materials are produced to the tables where the finished product is consumed. Cooperative marketing, like animals, must grow. There never was but one full-sized animal made, and the Maker regretted doing that afterward.

It is nothing strange to have creamerymen come to the department and ask, "What am I going to do with my butter from this on?" We ask, "What have you been doing with it?" The reply invariably is, "I've been selling to a chain store." "Well", we say, "keep right on selling it to a chain store until you find a better place to sell it." "Yes", the reply will be, "but I can't. They've notified me they can't use my butter any longer." In checking up on this we found that 2,000 chain stores in one city had formed a buying agency to buy butter for all these stores. After about a year's effort this agency found where it could purchase a definite quantity of butter to be delivered every day in the year to supply these stores. The object was, of course, to reduce costs and to secure an even flow of butter going into these stores to supply their needs. This could not be accomplished by buying a part of a carload of one small creamery at one time and a part of a carload of another creamery at another time. When they got the supply they wanted, in the way they wanted it, they began to drop the small creameries from their lists.

One local group was particularly anxious that the department should not talk cooperative marketing to its members. This did not disturb the department because it knew the time would come when that group would see the necessity for beginning a program of cooperative marketing. So when the chain stores dropped three of the small creameries of this group the group got together, bought machinery to rework and pack the butter of these three creameries into pound packages, sold it to retail stores in near-by cities, paid the creameries the same price the group received for its butter, and made a net profit of 2 cents per pound for their trouble. Other groups will be driven to do this same thing, and it will not be long before groups will find themselves competing with each other for the same market. To avoid this, groups will join into still larger groups until, we hope, they will have a single marketing organization.

Following this the independent stores of this same city began to build up the same kind of buying agency. But, I fear, Wisconsin creameries will not be able to utilize that market because they are not organized to sell in the quantities that will be required. Something over a year and a half ago the department found a broker who was selling sweet cream in various cities from Boston to Washington, D.C., who was looking for a concern that could furnish him a carload of cream per day, regularly throughout the year. Could he find such a concern he would contract to pay 33⅓ percent above the Chicago price for butterfat. The department combed the State to find a cooperative large enough to do that. The best we could do was to find one that could furnish three carloads per week, so that order went to another State. Had we been so organized as to fill that order it would have meant an income of $335,000 over what the butterfat brought to the farmers. This is becoming more and more a day of big buying, and unless farmers are organized to do big selling the disadvantages against them will become greater and greater as time goes on.

But, suppose we were organized to the point of approaching a monopoly. Just how much we would be able to control prices of what we have to sell I am unable to say. Prices depend on some things which even business monopolies cannot control. If there ever was an organization approaching a monopoly, it is the United States Steel Corporation. The price of steel has not been lower in years than it is today, and yet this corporation is not able to operate over 20 percent of its usual capacity simply because thousands of its former customers have not the money to buy at any price. There are 12,000,000 people out of work in the United States and other millions at work only part time at greatly reduced wages. These millions are not consumers of butter and cheese, and it is probable they consume very little milk. If butter should go to 30 cents, there would probably be other millions added to those who could not afford to buy. How can we get cost of production with so large a percentage of our population unable to buy our products? But there is one thing we can do. We can get most of what the food gamblers are now able to exact from us if we organize as we should.

Let us take a single milk-distributing company operating in the city of Milwaukee as an example of what is taking place. There are 12,000,000,000 pounds of milk produced in Wisconsin annually. This dairy company buys and distributes in that city approximately 185,000,000 pounds of milk annually, or about one sixty-fifth of the total amount produced in Wisconsin. Out of the profits made from the sale of that milk, this company, in 1930, was able to send $625,000 to a holding company in New York; was able to pay its president, vice president, secretary-treasurer, and its general manager $109,070 in salaries and commissions, the wife of the president $45,694; and on top of this made net profits amounting to $222,000, to say nothing of salaries paid to numerous other officials. This amounts to $956,070. It will take every drop of milk produced on 1,500 average farms to pay that amount. If that is happening with one sixty-fifth of the milk we produce, what must be the situation with the other sixty-four sixty-fifths? The profits made on butter are not as great as with fluid milk. Yet you can scarcely find a store but what you will have to pay from 2 to 4 times as much for cheese as the farmer gets for it.

I have heard only one farmer complain about the $55,000 salary paid the president of this Milwaukee milk concern, but I've heard hundreds of them complain about the $5,000 salaries the State pays to men who must cope with these big fellows. Yet the people of the State of Wisconsin pay these $55,000 salaries just as much as they pay the salaries of State officials.

The fight on State salaries did not originate among the farmers. It originated among these $55,000 fellows. They do not want to be interfered with. The minute they are, they put up a howl about cost of government, in the hope that the lawmakers will render a department useless. That is why we hear so much about abolishing the department of agriculture and markets. The department has interfered with the profits of certain gamblers in cheese. It made the rosy path of the milk distributors a little less smooth. It attempted to increase the annual income of egg producers in Wisconsin by $5,000,000. It has continued to tighten the reins on the food adulterators, and, worse of all, we have encouraged cooperative marketing, and have practically driven oleomargarine out of the State. So the cheese profiteers say the department must go. The food adulterators say the department must go. The egg dealers say it must go. The milk distributors say it must go. The food gamblers say it must go. The oleomargarine interests say it must go. Those who were stopped from grafting their thousands off the State fair say it must go; and the strange thing about it is they have been able to enlist many farmers in this movement by pointing to the cost of the department and telling the department has done nothing.

You no doubt have noticed such accusations against the department by most of the large newspapers of the State. Let me tell you of a little experience we had with some of these papers. We found that a certain company was short-weighting and short-testing the farmers on butterfat to the extent that if all the butterfat produced in Wisconsin had been so short weighted and tested it would have amounted to a steal of over $17,000,000. We started prosecution against this company. This company begged for the department to proceed against a poor, irresponsible employee and let the company go free. The department proposed to give this company some advertising in the press as to just what it was doing and said so. The reply was, "O.K.; if you think the papers we advertise in will publish anything about us, go to it." So far as I know, not a single paper but the Capital Times published a word of this story. If the food gamblers control the press, as they seemed to in this instance, they can control the press in what these gamblers want the press to say about the department of agriculture and markets. That is one reason why you see so much in the press against the department, and the charges the press makes against the department are almost identical with those made by the food gamblers.

They have made farmers believe the department can fix prices when the courts have held that this can only be done in times of emergency. They have made many farmers believe the fall in the price of butter was due to the enactment of the oleomargarine law, when, as a matter of fact, butter prices have fallen as unemployment has increased. They do not tell the farmer that the consumption of oleomargarine in this State has fallen from over 4,500,000 pounds annually to only a few thousand pounds. They do not tell the farmers that Wisconsin is only 1 among 48 States, and that its action alone may not increase butter prices very much, neither do they tell them that other States are following Wisconsin's leadership. That is where the shoe pinches most. That is why the department must be abolished. The best commissioner of agriculture an adjoining State ever had has just been replaced by a potato buyer. The old commissioner had to go because he meddled too much with the profits of the food gamblers. Officials of our department have been told if we will go along we can hold our jobs as long as we wish.

The fall in dairy prices is not wholly due to unemployment. The greatest drop in these prices started about 3 years ago. During that same period the number of cows in Wisconsin has increased 18 percent. When asked why they do this, the farmers invariably say, "Well, I have so much interest and taxes to pay. With prices as they were in 1928 and 1929 I could do this very comfortably and come out about even. When prices began to fall the only thing I could do was to increase my herd and load more work onto my family, if I hoped to save my home." What they were doing was to hasten their own destruction. What they ought to have been doing was to organize as they have in Denmark. There the farmers say what the tax rate shall be. They say what the interest rate shall be. They own banks through which they finance themselves. No Danish farmer goes to the food gambler for credit as we do in the United States. They furnish their own credit. Besides, there are no food gamblers to go to.

There is another problem growing up in this country which the farmers of Wisconsin could help solve if they were well organized, but which I see no way of solving if they are not. The department of agriculture in New York recently ruled that no cows can be shipped into that State unless they came from herds absolutely clean of contagious abortion. It makes no difference how free of this disease a cow may be, she is ruled out of the State of New York unless she comes from a herd that is free of it. The excuse given for it is the protection of the public health. The department knows that the Constitution prohibits a State from interfering with interstate commerce. But it also knows that courts uphold such interference when it is done in the interest of public health. The real purpose behind this order is to benefit a few dairy-cow producers in New York. There is only one other State more saturated with contagious abortion than New York, and there is no State cleaner of it than Wisconsin. If we shipped every clean cow we have into New York, practically every one of them would contract this disease within 6 months, because when they enter that State they are distributed among herds that are saturated with it.

This case is now before the Supreme Court of the United States; and if it is lost, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and other States are preparing to follow New York's example.

Georgia has a bill in its legislature prohibiting any dairy products from being shipped into that State until its own State veterinarian has tested the cows from which these products come and found them clean.

The health department in the city of Chicago is continually tightening up on Wisconsin producers of milk that goes into that city, when it is known the country over that no more pure or wholesome dairy products are produced anywhere than in Wisconsin. So what this department is actually doing is to gradually shut Wisconsin producers off the Chicago market and build up a dairy industry in Illinois to supply its needs.

If the Federal Government will not take cognizance of this thing, the thing to do, as I see it, is for the farmers to organize and refuse to buy a single article produced in these States, or to patronize a single business concern whose headquarters are in them. The people of Wisconsin will hesitate to do this, but they may be forced to fight fire with fire. But we prefer free and open markets for all.

These interests may not be especially concerned over what the farmers of Wisconsin may do. But they know that if such a movement started in Wisconsin, nothing would stop its spread into other States. That will concern them very materially.

Wisconsin is the greatest dairy State in the Union. Sixty-five percent of the income of our farmers comes from cows. Only 25 percent of our dairy products are consumed within the State. If we are eventually shut out from the markets of other States, what will we do with the other 75 percent?

Another thing organized farmers can do which the individual cannot do is to produce a high quality product and then advertise it. In one city in this country about $10,000 worth of a certain product was annually being sold. Then the producer spent $10,000 in advertising this product. The sales immediately jumped to $112,000 a year. Wisconsin produces more canned vegetables than any other State in the Union, and yet one can scarcely buy a can of vegetables anywhere that has a Wisconsin label on it. They are all labeled to advertise the jobber or the grocer selling them. If Wisconsin were properly organized, it would have labels advertising Wisconsin as the citrus-fruit growers do with California.

Again, farmers properly organized could get any legislation within reason out of almost any legislative body. During the 8 years I was in Congress I got just two letters from farmers telling me how to vote, while I received tons of letters, telegrams, and literature from special interests telling me how to vote. Is it any wonder these interests get all the breaks in legislation and the farmers get none? Suppose that thing were turned around and Members of Congress were flooded with letters, telegrams, and literature from farmers and they scarcely ever heard from special interests? Nine out of every ten Congressmen would break their necks to vote for what the farmers wanted. "But", you say, "we can't afford to do that." Neither could they if they were not able to reach over into your pockets and get the money to do it with.

This leads me to say a few words about the farm allotment bill before the last Congress. This bill was backed by all the leading farm papers in the country and by the leading farm organizations. I would not support it simply because farm papers are behind it, because I've long had the suspicion that many of them, as well as certain self-styled farm organizers, are more interested in farming the farmers than they are in the farmers themselves. But I do have confidence in the farm leaders who gathered in Washington to frame this bill. If I had been in Congress I would probably have voted for it, though I'm not sure it would have the effect claimed for it. Take butter as an illustration. We are told that the passage of this bill will mean an additional income of $17,000,000 to the farmers of Wisconsin. That means that the price of butter would be increased by at least 10 cents per pound. That will give the farmer several million dollars to spend for the products of the city worker, which in turn will start our factories moving.

When the city worker gets a job he will, in turn, become a consumer of farm products. But with the present-day development of labor-saving machinery, where 25,000 men can produce more automobiles than 300,000 produced 30 years ago; with the development of a road machine that does more work every time its jaws drop into the earth than nine men with pick and shovel can do in an entire day; with the invention of a simple device on the railroads that does the work of 40,000 men; with the invention of a steel that will cause an automobile to last 50 years instead of 5; with the invention of the radio that has thrown thousands of musicians, actors, and actresses out of work; and what is true with these is also true in the milling industry, breadbaking, brick manufacture, cement-road building, cigar and cigarette manufacture, and bottlemaking, and all other industries. I cannot see much hope until the benefits of labor-saving machinery are spread out over the whole people instead of going to a few manufacturers, or until some new occupations are developed. Everywhere a person goes to get a job he finds a machine doing the work. In fact, the development of machines within the last 10 years has thrown more people out of work than such development did during the preceding century.

And yet until these millions can get something to do, some way of earning money to buy our farm products, I can't see any way of our getting out of this depression. If machines that are already developed, and will continue to be developed, are to do all the work, what is there for the unemployed to do? How are they to again become consumers of our dairy products? So if our trouble lies in this direction, I do not see how the domestic allotment bill will help very much.

So I am wondering what would happen if the domestic-allotment bill had passed and the price of butter increased 10 cents per pound. Last summer the price of butter dropped to 16 cents. By December it increased to 26 cents. But consumption fell off to the extent that it again dropped to 16 cents in February. If this allotment bill would have that same effect, I can't see much good it would do unless factory employment were also increased.

We are told that farmers are producing too much surplus and the allotment bill would cut down the farm acreage. If this is the trouble, then it would cost only about one third as much for the Government to pay the farmer a fair rental for lands on which surpluses are produced and allow them to lay idle than it would cost under any other scheme that has been proposed and would be more satisfactory in every way.

So, as I said before, I am wondering if the solution may not lie in dividing up the benefits of the machine and not permit them all to go to the owner. I ask myself the question: "Why allow a few manufacturers all the benefits at the expenses of the farmers and wage earners? How am I to pay for shoes and clothes unless the thing that makes them takes its pay in my dairy products?" A machine does not eat butter and cheese, nor does it drink milk; and the owner of that machine, 10 to 1, eats nothing unless it is imported.

One solution offered is to tax the machine, until it becomes unprofitable to operate it. Trade unions urge that when a machine takes the place of 2 men let 1 operate it half the time and the other the other half at the same wage each received before. The Federal Government seems to favor a modified combination of these as shown by the Federal Highway Commission's issuing orders that no State shall receive Federal aid that uses machines to do work that can be done by hand labor and employs labor more than 30 hours per week. This Commission would cut the hours of labor in half and order the machine out of use instead of taxing it out.

The technocrats tell us that if the benefits of machines were equally distributed over the entire population, 100,000,000 people in the United States would have twice what is necessary to maintain their present standard of living and could do it by working only 4 hours per week. If that is true, then all power to them. That is just about the amount of labor I like to do in a week.

There was a provision in the allotment plan which would be of inestimable benefit to the farmers of this country should it become a law. It proposes to practically shut out the importation of fats and oils. These amount to 1,800,000,000 pounds annually. That is an average of 15 pounds for each man, woman, and child living in the United States, every pound of which could be produced by our own farmers. What a market that would furnish us, a market taken away by New York capitalists. It is herein that lies what is called the "Philippine question." These capitalists, who seem to control a great many votes in Congress, insist on our keeping the island until they have time to bleed them dry and to bankrupt every farmer in America, say, "Oh, we can't let them go for the next 25 years. They can't learn to govern themselves in less time." They never offer the real reason. A compromise was reached and a bill was passed over the President's veto giving them 10 years in which to rob that country and bankrupt us. So we will have to stand being greased by foreign fats and oils for another 10 years, I presume.

There is one more thought I want to leave with you, then I'm through. I want to leave with you a few things which I believe the department has been able to accomplish for agriculture in this State. A little over a year ago the department initiated a grading system for cheese. We then sent men into the factories to help the cheesemakers improve their quality of cheese, and here are the results as taken from the books of one factory: The year before the grading system was started, 60 percent of the cheese produced in this factory went into the grinder grade or no. 3, which is now selling for 7 cents per pound; 31 percent went into no. 2 and 8 percent into no. 1. The next year, when this factory worked on the grading system, it ceased to produce the grinder grade, increased its no. 1 cheese from 8 percent to 76 percent, and reduced its no. 2 from 31 percent to 24 percent. On the same volume of cheese this meant an increase of over $8,500 to the patrons of this factory.

Prior to the inauguration of the cheese-grading system, the price of cheese was always fixed at about one half the price of butter. That is not the exact figure but it is near enough for the purpos I'm using it. Since grading began, the amount of no. 1 cheese has almost trebled, and the price in its relation to the price of butter has increased from 2 cents to 3½ cents per pound. Other things being equal, this means an increase of income of about $5 per cow, per year, for the patrons of the cheese industry, or a total of something like $7,000,000.

The price of Wisconsin milk going to the condenseries brought from 1 cent to 6 cents more per hundred pounds in 1932 than in either Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, or Michigan, the leading condensary States. That alone, applied to all the milk products in Wisconsin, would amount to over $5,000,000.

In 1929 the price of Wisconsin butter averaged 48.7 cents, while Minnesota's average was 48.1 cents; Illinois, 43.7 cents; Michigan, 45.8 cents; Iowa, 46.8 cents; and the average for the United States was 48.9 cents. While the price of butter has been on the decline since that time, the price of Wisconsin butter has not declined to the extent it has in other dairy States. The average price for Wisconsin butter for 1931 was 28.7 cents; Minnesota, 27.4 cents; Illinois, 24.2 cents; Michigan, 26.2 cents; Iowa, 26.5 cents; while the average for the United States was 25.4 cents. Two years before, the price of Wisconsin butter was 0.2 cent below the average for the United States. Last year it averaged 3.3 cents above the average for the United States, or a difference of 3½ cents per pound in favor of Wisconsin farmers. Three and a half cents per pound applied to the 172,000,000 pounds of butter made in the State means an advantage to the Wisconsin farmers of something like $6,000,000 over the farmers of the rest of the country.

Our system of potato grading has enhanced the value of Wisconsin potatoes by $400,000 and is again replacing them on the markets once lost by our failure to grade.

In Illinois it costs the taxpayers 55 cents per head to test cattle for tuberculosis. In Wisconsin we have been able to reduce our cost to 10 cents per head, saving the taxpayers approximately one and one third million dollars.

I think of one other influence that has helped to depress farm prices and that has been the bringing into cultivation of many thousands of acres of lands not suitable for agricultural purposes. This caused the legislature to require the department of agriculture and markets to make a survey of land, particularly in the northern counties, to determine what lands are suitable for agriculture and what are not, and to suggest what those lands, not suitable for agriculture may best be utilized for. The department has surveyed about 2,000,000 acres during the last 2 years.

Real-estate sharks are no longer able to palm off worthless lands onto those looking for agricultural lands, and the board of control is placing prison camps on those not fit for agriculture, and in conjunction with the conservation commission, is engaged in a real constructive program of reforestation. This has also resulted in saving the taxpayers of the State millions of dollars in costly buildings to house prisoners.

If I have said anything that will help you to decide for yourselves what steps you should take toward overcoming the problems that confront agriculture, I shall be pleased. But whatever it may be, it should be with a united front, and with the full knowledge of what you are up against. Never has there been a more determined, concerted action on the part of certain business interests—gamblers in the products of the farm—than now. These interests know that if the cooperative movement is to be smashed, now is the time to do it. Whenever a war is started on a cooperative in Wisconsin, that same war is started on the same kind of cooperative in every other State, and every cooperative is having the same experience at the present time. The only way to meet this fight is by a united front on the part of the farmers.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair) laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES—COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. From the Committee on Finance, I report favorably the nomination of Guy T. Helvering to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue and ask that it go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask whether this is a unanimous report?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state how the committee stood?

Mr. BARKLEY. My recollection is that the vote was 10 to 6 on the roll call.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] was called from the Chamber on official business; and, acting for him and at his request, I submit a minority report on this nomination and ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. LONERGAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Thomas Hewes, of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further reports of committees? If not, the calendar is in order.

THE CALENDAR

Executive C (72d Cong., 2d sess.), a treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed on July 18, 1932, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The treaty will be passed over.

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James Fuller McKinley to be The Adjutant General.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think that had better go over.

Mr. LONG. I should like to have the nomination passed over.

Mr. REED. I think this nomination ought to be passed over until Monday, because the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is interested, and he has had to be away today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Stephen B. Gibbons, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, yesterday the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, asked that this nomination go over, and he is not now here. I think it ought to go over until he is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi asked that this nomination go over in order that the Senator from Michigan might be here when it was considered.

Mr. COUZENS. I understood that; but I have just left the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, and information has been submitted to me which I have not with me, and I desire to put it in the RECORD before any action is taken. I can see no objection to having the nomination go over.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether he is referring to Mr. Gibbons?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes. I just left Mr. Gibbons and a Senator who gave me a memorandum concerning the history of Mr. Gibbons. I did not know the nomination would come up when I left the Senator from Mississippi, and I have not the memorandum with me. I should like to submit it to the Senate before confirmation is had of this nomination.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator be willing, perhaps, to have it taken up at the next executive session.

Mr. COUZENS. I should be willing tonight if I had the memorandum with me. I shall certainly be willing to have it taken up at the next executive session.

Mr. COPELAND. In that case I have no objection to its going over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Arthur E. Morgan, of Ohio, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination go over until I have an opportunity to make some investigation of Mr. Morgan. I do that for the reason that one of the avowed objects of the Muscle Shoals law, as I understand, includes flood control. I have rather definite but not very detailed remembrance of Mr. Morgan as being one of the leading propagandists, 4 or 5 years ago, against the Mississippi River flood-control measure; and I should like to have an opportunity of investigating the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will go over.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of J. Walter Doyle, of Hawaii, to be collector of customs district no. 32, with headquarters at Honolulu, Hawaii.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, May 27, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 26 (legislative day of May 15), 1933

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY

Alexander W. Weddell, of Virginia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Argentina.

SECRETARY IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

Clarence E. Gauss, of Connecticut, now a Foreign Service officer of class 1 and a consul general, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States of America.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

James R. Fleming, of Indiana, to be United States attorney, northern district of Indiana, to succeed Oliver M. Loomis, term expired.

Val Nolan, of Indiana, to be United States attorney, southern district of Indiana. He is now serving in this position under an appointment by the court.

ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

William Zimmerman, Jr., of Illinois, to be Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, vice J. Henry Scattergood.

PROMOTIONS IN THE REGULAR ARMY

MEDICAL CORPS

To be lieutenant colonels

Maj. George Russell Callender, Medical Corps, from May 18, 1933.

Maj. Edward Thomas Breinig Weidner, Medical Corps, from May 19, 1933.

Maj. Raymond Whitcomb Bliss, Medical Corps, from May 20, 1933.

Maj. Norman Thomas Kirk, Medical Corps, from May 22, 1933.

Maj. William Benjamin Borden, Medical Corps, from May 23, 1933.

To be captains

First Lt. Roland Keith Charles, Jr., Medical Corps, from May 20, 1933.

First Lt. Joseph Julius Hornisher, Medical Corps, from May 22, 1933.

MEDICAL ADMINISTRATIVE CORPS

To be first lieutenant

Second Lt. Edward James Gearin, Medical Administrative Corps, from May 18, 1933.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate May 26 (legislative day of May 15), 1933

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

J. Walter Doyle, to be collector of customs, district no. 32, with headquarters at Honolulu, Hawaii.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 26, 1933

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

Rev. J. L. Meads, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Benton, Ill., offered the following prayer:

Earth from afar has heard Thy fame
And mortal man has learned to list to Thy name.

O Thou great God over all, we implore Thy blessing upon us. We pray Thee bless our Nation. Give us strong, virile men to meet with every issue, to solve every problem. Bless, we pray Thee, this gathering, these lawmakers, the Speaker, the Chaplain, every Member of this body. May Thy peace be upon them, O Lord, and may strength be given them—clearness of vision, serenity of spirit, complacency of soul, courage to face every issue. We pray Thee, O Lord, to bless our President and all men everywhere. Bless our Nation, Lord, and make contentment and peace be in the hearts and homes of all our people. Grant to lead us, O Lord, with Thy counsel. Forsake us not, lest we perish. We deplore our weakness. We confess our sins. We magnify Thy grace. We would extol Thy virtues. We would have Thy holy spirit indwell us. We pray Thee, O Lord, that whatever we do in word or deed we may do all to the glory of God, and eventually do Thou lead us to the homeland where, with the angelic hosts and spirits of the just made perfect, we may praise Thee more perfectly, world without end. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord and Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. COUZENS, and Mr. KEAN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H.R. 5661) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes; insists upon its amendments; and requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. GLASS, Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. MCADOO, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, in the proceedings of this House yesterday the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. SUMNERS of Texas], made the statement that, although it is recognized by those familiar with legislative history in the House that the subject of the antitrust law and kindred laws has fallen as a matter of jurisdiction to his committee, and, although it was contemplated that the Judiciary Committee would test the jurisdiction of the Ways and Means Committee with reference to title 1 of the national industrial recovery bill, which proposes a suspension of the antitrust law, an understanding was reached whereby the Judiciary Committee would not test the jurisdiction with regard to title I in this particular instance.

The bill under consideration not only violates the rules of this House but tramples upon 40 years of Democratic Party declarations on the antitrust question. The enactment of this bill will mean the deathblow to antitrust laws of this country. In the future there will be only organizations of the big rich and those who receive doles at their hands. The chain system will be perfected.

I ask the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee if he will not submit to this House an amendment striking from the bill all references to the antitrust laws. Or, if he does not wish to do this, I will ask him to permit the Members of the House to offer such an amendment.

The chairman has ample time before the completion of the bill, to assemble his committee for this purpose. If he does not grant this request, the membership of the House is denied the right to offer an amendment to the bill which would preserve the antitrust laws. Therefore, no matter how much good there is in the proposed bill, if one believes in principle that the antitrust laws should remain intact, he does violence to his conscience to vote for it in its present form.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In regard to the question of jurisdiction, of course, I am certain that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] recognizes that the bill incorporates revenue provisions and was properly referred to the Ways and Means Committee by the Speaker of the House under the rules of the House.

Mr. SHANNON. Yes; but the gentleman will concede that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] questioned the jurisdiction.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will further permit, it would be impossible, under the rules and customs of the House, to divide a bill into several sections for reference; that is, one section to be considered by one committee and another section by another committee. That is not done in the House.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield.

Mr. COX. It will be perfectly apparent to the gentleman by studying the bill which his committee reports that the title which raises the constitutional question to which the gentleman from Missouri is speaking in nowise related to title II and other titles of the provision which deal with the public-building questions.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What would the gentleman do with reference to this bill if he were Speaker? How would he refer it?

Mr. SHANNON. I think there should have been a joint meeting on the subject and that the Committee on the Judiciary should have taken cognizance of it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Now, I would ask the gentleman this question: A bill in which he was very much interested, in which both the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Ways and Means had jurisdiction of certain portions, namely, the beer bill, was referred to one committee. I did not hear the gentleman make any objection to the reference of that bill to the one committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] has expired.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that as this is a part of the bill under consideration, we should get along and not take up too much time, although I am personally not going to object. I think we ought to take up the important business that we met at 11 o'clock to pursue.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ARE THE BANKS OF OUR COUNTRY TO BE PERMITTED TO CONTINUE TO BORROW MONEY FROM OUR GOVERNMENT AND PAY IT OVER TO ENGLISH INSURANCE COMPANIES?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday the House of Representatives passed Senate bill 1094, providing for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock, and so forth, of insurance companies. In the debate on the rule bringing the bill before the House (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 24, 1933, p. 4109) I called attention to the public interest involved in providing funds to prevent the further failure of our insurance companies with the consequent loss to investors, policyholders, and employees.

I further pointed out the serious situation from a national business standpoint of our insurance going to foreign companies. Such a transfer of business has recently reached enormous proportions.

This insurance bill was patterned on the bill we passed early in this special session permitting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase the preferred stock of banks. I understand that in addition to the millions already loaned to banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a large amount of their preferred stock has now been purchased.

I earnestly supported both bills, but only today a situation was called to my attention which is shocking and should be corrected by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or by legislation, if necessary. I refer to the fact that many banks, including some who have borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, are placing their insurance with foreign companies.

I am informed that the following banks and banking firms in New York City are placing their insurance at Lloyds' companies, London (incidentally Lloyds pay no taxes to the United States for the privileges of doing business in this country):

	Annual premium
National City Bank and affiliates, New York	$200,000
Guaranty Trust and affiliates, New York	175,000
Corn Exchange Bank Trust, New York	69,000
Marine Midland, New York	100,000
Manufacturers Trust, New York	75,000
J. P. Morgan	150,000
Spire & Co	75,000
Brooklyn Trust	40,000
Kings County Trust	40,000
Goldman Sachs	30,000
Kuhn Loeb	75,000

Continental Bank & Trust Co., Chicago (General Dawes' bank), and this list can be substantially augmented I understand.

Besides the above New York City business, the premiums for bankers' blanket bonds of American banks and/or trust companies going to London annually aggregate about $10,000,000—and, indeed, many of the banks insured in London, while possibly not presently obligated to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, since this institution was brought into being they have, undoubtedly, received aid from it.

If American insurance companies are to be protected, banks with national charters and possibly State banks should be compelled to insure with companies admitted to do business in the United States of America and paying taxes to the Government for the privilege of doing so. In other words, the banker should be content to keep the premiums on his banker's blanket bonds in this country since the purpose of such bonds is to protect depositors and/or stockholders, and with this being the case the premiums should be retained within the confines of the country.

It is a fact that the larger surety companies—the Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., Hartford Accident and Fidelity & Deposit, of which latter company President Roosevelt was formerly an officer and, indeed, exceptionally active in its management—are losing business daily to London.

In the New York Legislature of 1933, assembly bill no. 2335 was designed to penalize banks and trust companies and others sending their business to London. The penalty was 20 percent of the premium to be retained at the source and paid by the buyer of insurance to the State tax commission, a further penalty being 5 percent for any willful evasion, and a further 1 percent additional for each month the tax is unpaid.

That bill was introduced in the senate and passed that house unanimously, but in the Republican-controlled assembly the bill never came out of the rules committee. Incidentally, I understand that the Honorable Charles D. Hilles, Republican national committeeman from New York, is attorney for the Employers Liability Insurance Co. of London.

If bankers' blanket bonds were all placed in this country, insurance companies would be adding help today instead of laying it off so that any steps which might be fostered toward compelling banks to insure in this country with companies admitted to do business and paying taxes accordingly would be a step in keeping with the principles now being propounded by President Roosevelt of giving employment whenever possible.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the time fixed for general debate be extended 1 hour, one half the additional time to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and one half by myself. The reason I ask that is that I have many more requests for time than I have been able to accommodate, and there are a great many members of the committee who will not be able to speak at all unless that request is granted. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 1 hour, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time there is for general debate now, including this 1 hour additional?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] had remaining 1 hour and 35 minutes; the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] 1 hour and 25 minutes; to which has been added by unanimous consent one half hour on each side.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 5755, the national industrial recovery bill, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have never listened to a more complete explanation of the constitutional questions involved in any bill than that of yesterday, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] discussed the bill we have before us today.

I am not going to speak on that phase of the bill. It would be useless after the fine exposition by our colleague [Mr. BECK]. If unconstitutional, there is a better way to test it, if this bill passes and it is put in force. It will be put in force immediately, of course, and then the courts will pass upon the many questions raised under the variety of purposes included in the bill.

I want to discuss briefly, however, one phase of the methods of taxation now included in the bill, because it is a great subject that would require much time to cover by argument on that single proposition. The bill is voluminous in character, and few Members, I assume, even of the committee, have a complete grasp of the entire bill. It was placed before us in its present form, with taxes to be added, and inside of 2 days it was brought out here before you gentlemen. The committee stayed in session until 9 or 10 o'clock at night in efforts to expedite its consideration. Let me say in passing that the chairman of the committee [Mr. DOUGHTON] was very courteous to all of us, and one of the finest things said was when he paid a compliment to the Republican members, without distinction, as did some other members on the Democratic side, for our cooperation in trying to aid instead of stopping the wheels of progress while getting the bill before the House.

There were very few amendments accepted, you may be sure. We simply gave voice to what we had to offer, but I want to say that many avenues of revenue are possible in the taxation field outside of those which would be tapped by the proposal contained in the bill. Director Douglas offered 4 proposals, 2 containing a manufacturers' sales tax. Rather than swallow the latter I accepted the first combination, but agreed with Republican members who were opposed to that proposal for various reasons.

My one conspicuous objection is the additional tax on dividends found in the bill, and I speak not from personal influence or its personal effect. The tax on dividends placed in this bill just doubles the same taxes in amount which you now pay. The tax on dividends amounts to this: First the corporation exacts a tax. Next you as an individual pay on dividends received under the income tax law. Third, this further tax is an arbitrary third method of extracting the last part of dividends left, and a State law takes away any remainder. On $10,000 of dividends, if you are getting any dividends today, using this figure as an illustration, the present tax amounts to $630. Now, there is a tax placed upon dividends again beyond the corporation tax, which is a second means of getting cash; a triple tax comes from this next extraction method, and you will have to pay $630 more, or $1,260, on $10,000—if you get or, rather, had it. I am just developing this thought. If there is injustice in it at all, it is certainly gross in this case.

I suggested to the Director of the Budget, Mr. Douglas, when the committee was discussing the tax question that a tax of 2 cents be placed on cigarettes. Well, there was an immediate explosion in the committee, and naturally so, because we get great revenue out of tobacco taxes now, but heavy taxes on tobacco are also paid in foreign countries. As a matter of fact it is one of the largest, if not the largest single item of taxes from which they can get revenues abroad, and you pay 2 and 3 times as much for cigarettes there as we do here. For the same kind of cigarettes we get here for 10, 15, or 20 cents at the outside, there you pay as high as 50, 60, and even 75 cents, as I have paid. That was the highest amount paid, but paid in Moscow, and I was willing to get cigarettes at that, even though they were inferior cigarettes. It is said the tobacco grower does not get out of his products what he ought to get, and that is certain to be so, but it does not make any difference what tax you put on tobacco, the tobacco grower is affected, for it is the cigarette manufacturer who effects combinations to depress the tobacco market. They enter into combinations so that George W. Hill, president of the American Tobacco Co., is today making a claim for $2,500,000 for a 1932 salary and bonus. That suit is pending today in the Supreme Court of the United States, to determine whether he is entitled to $2,500,000 for 1932 as income and bonus. If you want to reach his racket, I say put a tax of 100 per cent on bonuses, so as to protect the innocent stockholder who sends on his proxy and who has no real voice in proceedings had at stockholders' meetings. That is one tax suggested. I will put into the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, who says this tax will bring in $100,000,000 a year, or an additional tax of 2 cents on cigarettes which today are selling from 10 to 12½ cents at the stores.

Another tax—and this is a reasonable tax—would be to bring all revenues on mail matter up to the level where the service pays for itself. We are running $200,000,000 behind in the Postal Department. Another would be to keep the 80 percent estate tax we improperly give to the States.

I want you to read my remarks, because I do not intend to go very far into this tax proposition here, but I think they will be interesting to those who care particularly for the constitutional phase of the question. I say that to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], who beyond question is the strongest and ablest constitutional authority in the House, for I am suggesting also what should be done in balancing the Budget, and what would be done under a dictatorship, as was prophesied by the gentleman as likely to occur in this country if we follow Russia and Poland and Italy. Let me say I spent 2 hours with General Pilsudski in Warsaw, and spent time with Chicharin Kalinin, the President, and other officials, and know the objectionable features of their dictatorships. Some of those who have been denouncing the American Congress through the press are people who do not realize what loss of confidence in the American Congress will mean to the American people if they follow the advice to take up a dictatorship. This is one of wide authority, but we are on our way; and though many support the President's request, others equally sincere are opposed.

Now, I do not want to go into taxation particularly in the brief time at my disposal. Mr. Chairman, I am just going to say a few additional words, because what I put in the RECORD will disclose the scope of my argument in regard to the manufacturers' tax. A gentleman sat right there yesterday, one of the ablest men, I believe, on your Democratic side of the House, and he paid me a compliment rarely had; never before, I believe. He said, "You are the only man who persuaded me to change my vote after I had agreed to the contrary and without ever speaking to me." I thanked him for it. It was because I placed in the RECORD last session an argument against the manufacturers' tax.

It is impossible to put such tax in force now. Tommy Adams—and I knew him as Tommy Adams because he was from my State and I helped to put him on the tax board of my State—he was the only man who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee last session to discuss a manufacturers' sales tax and he then stated it would be impossible to put such tax in force in 2 years. This is an emergency proposition for 1 year, and some of you gentlemen were with him and accompanied him on the train and spent 2 long days in Canada to learn all about the manufacturers' tax up there, together with the entertainment provided by the generous publisher who furnished the train and who, incidentally, runs a newspaper that eternally abuses the American Congress. Dr. Tommy Adams was one of the best-posted men to be had on taxation. He represented the Treasury Department and Columbia University and others and he opposed it on general principles and said do not pass that law unless it can be in force longer than 2 years, because it takes that long to put it into full operation.

A motion to recommit will be offered to put in the sales tax. I am not going to argue this tax here because most of you know my position on it, although it would help me and help you more to have a sales tax than to put on an increased income tax, but you are representing, as I am, your people at home. You are representing the wage earner, the farmers as well as others least able to pay. Protests have come to me constantly, and are coming to me constantly, from constituents opposing a sales tax, and they are right about it because it is a sweating tax on the one who is least able to pay. I have given it some study; and if you will do me the courtesy to even read a portion of the remarks I am putting in the RECORD, I shall appreciate it.

Years ago I used to take the floor here constantly, as my friends know, in opposition to what was called the "old sales" tax proposals, and we defeated them repeatedly.

This measure is going to the United States Senate, and do not forget that when we get through with an item here and it is adopted and you are disconsolate about it, the people over there are going to discuss it and debate it.

They are going to find out the possible benefits or uncertainties of every proposition. I would not put these statements in the RECORD if it were not going to be examined, as I believe it will be. Senators also are going to express themselves on what they believe is right on the subject of taxation, which is the only provision of the bill that was left to us to consider.

I am not going to criticize the President of the United States. He is carrying a heavy responsibility, but I think the strongest point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] yesterday in his admirable presentation, was that it is not the President, but the administrator to whom we delegate this enormous power that covers practically every agency in every field of industrial activity.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. COX. The gentleman states that the only section of the bill that his committee considered was the tax section.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; so far as having any voice in its determination.

Mr. COX. Did the gentleman have a disposition or a desire to bring to bear his notions as to what was proper legislation upon the other details of the bill?

Mr. FREAR. I may say to the gentleman from Georgia that I had the same disposition that he would have had if similarly placed.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee unanimously joined the Democratic members in voting for the public works bill in committee so far as I now remember. This is betraying no confidence, but indicates the general disposition on the part of Members to support the President in his program, although many provisions of the bill were questioned, particularly those granting practically unlimited powers, ordinarily determined by Congress. It also answers the unfortunate comment of those who assert politics has entered into the situation.

The Republican members of the committee, however, asked to have placed in the report a statement that they disagreed with the majority of the committee in the tax feature embodied in the bill, and it is to that feature alone that I wish to address myself. As the bill covers an appropriation of $3,300,000,000 with a yearly tax with which to retire the debt of more than $220,000,000 annually, the vast sums involved warrant more than passing argument on that feature of the bill.

My objection to the tax feature did not arise from the much-discussed manufacturer's tax, which is not contained in the proposal accepted by the committee and which to some extent influenced the action of minority members of the committee in their objection to the tax feature. Although agreeing to the necessity of balancing the Budget and the importance of careful selection of the tax program, I did believe and so stated in committee that other sources of income would be preferable to some of those adopted by the committee and now appearing in the bill.

One of these that would have furnished approximately $100,000,000 annually, according to Treasury estimates, and that is justified in preference to some of the taxes imposed could be collected by a 2-cent additional tax on packages of cigarettes. I am not discussing objections naturally raised to this tax from tobacco producers who are not now permitted to receive their fair proportion of production costs and who suffer injustice, not from the tax paid but from the powerful control of tobacco producers by the great cigarette-manufacturing companies.

The present cigarette tax seems large, but it should be remembered that this source of revenue in many cases is practically the largest item abroad and amounts to a Government concession that cannot there be escaped. In many European countries today cigarettes are sold to the consumer at prices ranging from 40 cents to 75 cents a package, often of an inferior quality, whereas in this country large cigarette dealers receive a profit when selling at prices ranging from 10 cents to 20 cents a package and, generally speaking, for a superior brand of cigarettes. In other words, the prices in this country are less than one half and often less than one third of those quoted abroad for similar products that are deemed to be a luxury.

Another element in this cigarette-tax proposal arises from the facts as reported by the press that George W. Hill, president of the American Tobacco Co., it is alleged, has charged and is seeking to collect from his company $2,500,000 for last year's salary and bonus, while the vice presidents and other officials of the company seemingly are in a conspiracy against the interests of stockholders in general and are receiving large bonuses in addition to their salaries which necessarily are taken from the profits of the company belonging legitimately to the stockholders.

This case is now awaiting decision by the United States Supreme Court, according to the press.

This case comes about through the ability of officers of the company to control such matters at the stockholders' meetings through the accumulation of proxies that naturally are placed in the hands of the officers from those unable to attend the meeting.

A vigorous protest against awarding such bonuses to the tobacco officials has occurred so that a suit was instigated to prevent collection of the bonus from the company's revenues, and that suit as stated is now awaiting a decision in the Supreme Court of the United States. When cigarette companies are able to pay their dividends, although slightly below that paid in some past years and the officers seek to collect fabulous bonuses and salaries which combined are 250 times the full legal salaries paid to Members of Congress and nearly half as much to one tobacco official as the combined salaries of 96 Senators and 435 Members of the Seventy-third Congress, due to the latter's voluntary reduction in pay, it would seem beyond question that the cigarette field of taxation offers a better source of revenue than some of those adopted by the bill, and I speak particularly of a tax on dividends to be imposed which is in addition to the tax collected from the corporation, and the tax already paid by individuals on incomes reaches in all practically a triple tax on dividends. Only those having enormous losses, which, however, do not counterbalance enormous profits made in the past, as disclosed by Senate committee hearings, are able to accept such methods of taxation without protest. Incidentally a tax of 100 percent on bonuses would be the best method of protecting stockholders from the activities of racketeering officials.

Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to those looking for fertile fields of increased revenues that a repeal of the 80-percent estate tax given to States will bring about a substantial amount. In view of the present startling Morgan and Mitchell income-tax disclosures Congress should reduce any loss deductions by confining losses to the year in which occurring or deducting to a maximum of 25 percent of the income instead of permitting full cancelation, as occurred in the illuminating cases of legalized tax evasions by these men of large wealth.

The losses from postal undercharges we were informed by Director Douglas would be reduced about 25 percent in 1933 from losses of 1932. If the President, under authority conferred by Congress, will reduce the postal loss of $200,000,000 in 1932 to $100,000,000, or 50 percent, in 1933, that aid will increase proportionate revenues by reducing losses to nearly one half of the $220,000,000 needed to finance this public-works bond issue.

It is understood that the Postal Department proposes to cut down this loss over 25 percent as stated under authority given to the President by Congress, and attention was called in the hearing on this bill to the item of $36,400,000 loss from the mail carriage of daily papers and $28,700,000 from the carriage of other publications together with $11,600,000 loss caused by papers other than dailies, and also $8,600,000 from free-in-county papers, or a total of over $80,000,000 "loss" in this item alone from papers that have a certain educational value which entitles them to special consideration, but papers which in many cases have denounced and misrepresented and sought to belittle Congress to an extent never before had through this powerful propaganda.

It has been suggested that the enormous circulation enjoyed by some of the most willful detractors of the American Congress could properly be taxed, both among the great daily papers, with reasonable exemptions in circulation, and also magazines enjoying enormous circulation that frequently contain unjust criticisms and captious references to Congress in practically every edition, and that a nominal tax so levied would bring a far larger amount to the Federal Treasury than the income to be collected from the various sources of taxation under this bill or the manufacturers' tax proposed as a substitute.

It is easy to defend such papers and periodicals from any tax because immediately the press or magazine publication, whatever it may be, gratefully acknowledges with generous publicity notices any such defense that may be offered. While, on the other hand, any attempt to explain or defend the actions of Congress is certain to bring down unmerited criticisms from the extreme publications referred to or, what is deemed equally effective, no publicity.

The difficulty in taxing papers without imposing unjust burdens in many cases is apparent and has not been seriously urged upon the committee, although many Members have agreed that this source of taxation is one that, if seriously considered, would help balance the Budget and relieve to a great extent a public apprehension from lack of confidence in the American Congress and Government arising from such unwarranted attacks. Publications that strain at a gnat when crying aloud in the wilderness over a tenth of 1 percent cost to the Postal Department for all departmental and congressional franking, yet fail to recognize the loss, and swallowing of an $80,000,000 camel, or more than 15 percent of the total postal expenditures, all evidence the unfairness of arguments presented.

Among the most bitter and unwarranted denunciations of the American Congress are sales-tax articles regularly appearing in the Hearst papers that slander Congress individually and collectively for not adopting Mr. Hearst's private views on the subject of a sales tax, and yet not one tax expert of standing, outside of editorial writers so employed, is among those who have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee during recent years advocating such tax.

Assaults on public men and crucifixion of honest officials are destructive when directed against the innocent and guilty alike and can only please the one who indulges in unwarranted criticism, but when directed at the American Congress it causes loss of faith in the Government we represent.

It is significant that when special trains are paid for by a Hearst newspaper, however patriotic the owner is inclined to be, to carry Members of Congress to Canada to pursue a deep study of the sales tax for 2 consecutive days, during which entertainments galore are had in an attractive way, it may suggest the deep personal interest of the newspaper owner in the adoption of a sales tax. So, too, papers which enjoy enormous circulation and powerful influence and which pay 7-percent dividends on their stock, together with large income taxes by the publisher, would all be lessened if the average farmer and laborer with his family was enlisted in support of a sales tax.

I am not attempting to discuss the merits of a manufacturer's or other consumption tax or the fact that income taxes, estate taxes, and other like tax burdens are far less in this country than in many European countries, but that those with large incomes under our form of government should be ready to pay according to ability—and that includes Mr. Hearst—rather than to harangue and denounce a legislative body that seeks to equalize, as best it can under our form of government, these tax burdens. Those who declare that the average person does not pay anything toward the support of the Federal Government ignore the direct and indirect taxes that necessarily are borne by every purchaser of tobacco, cars, luxuries, and necessities, together with the renter, who pays the tax collected when turned over by the landlord, and a hundred other like illustrations that could be offered. These are not generally mentioned by the press that represents a powerful army of income-tax payers who naturally seek reductions in their tax burdens.

Notwithstanding the evident break-down in constitutional government repeatedly voiced in this debate, I do not share in the apprehension that a dictatorship, now popular in more than half of Europe, will soon envelop this country, or that the present dictatorship experiment will prove permanently popular here with unannounced agencies in the background to be then assigned to the role. I do believe that freedom of the press is a great bulwark against such aggression and that protection to our present form of government is best assured by preservation of the rights of the people under the Constitution.

It is, however, certain that in every dictatorship I have studied in Europe, more particularly in Russia, Poland, and Italy, which were visited, the press is without any semblance of freedom. I mention this fact to emphasize the point that every effort of a misguided press or of members of that honorable profession to break down public confidence in the American Congress, and to demand abandonment of legislative functions as laid down in the Constitution, is strong encouragement to an easily moved public by propaganda that our form of government has long since served its full purpose.

This effect must be known to every thinking person and I can find proof in the fact that one of the strongest factors in the present assault on Congress is an agency allegedly imbued with communism. But I have a matter of self-preservation in mind to suggest to those members of the press who join in the hue and cry against Congress.

The advent of a dictatorship is not necessarily all-destructive but does destroy liberty of action and of individual endeavor and of liberty of the press.

It is conceivable that any such change in our Government would cause the dictator to compel the Postal Department to become self-sustaining and an $80,000,000 deficit in carrying daily newspapers and other periodicals would quickly be wiped out in Budget balancing. Equally certain, in its effort to gain revenues, the new Government would soon determine that a virgin field of taxation would enable the Treasury to become self-sustaining by adding a source far more certain in amount and justification than any manufacturer's tax.

A brief examination could assure receipt of great revenues by giving limited exemptions in circulation without tax and then imposing a small tax on the great daily press and magazines of the country based on circulation. Studying circulations reaching millions in many single cases that are before me, now sold at insignificant cost to the public would become a well of Treasury income by adding a penny to the dailies and double that to magazines, bringing in more funds to the Federal Treasury than any manufacturer's tax yet suggested; and, bear in mind, the latter is to be imposed on those least able to pay. I am not now seriously suggesting such tax excepting to call attention to its excellent financial and taxable possibilities.

Congress endeavors to meet the tax problem without prejudice by collecting from those best able to pay, although it must be admitted that the triple tax on dividends reduces the income to a minimum for many comparatively poor people who have been left only a few securities after the provider has been taken away.

In the past I have discussed to some extent the manufacturer's sales tax problem which has been rejected by England and is only imperfectly enforced in most countries. Pyramiding and other tax evils have caused countries generally to reject this tax excepting for a brief emergency, but the danger from such course is illustrated by the camel's nose under the tent, which in Canada has raised the manufacturer's tax from 2 cents to 6 cents, paid by the consumer in higher prices, and has made the tax a permanent fixture in every government when once adopted because the sources of publicity are usually largely favorable to maintenance of such taxes.

Nearly every Member of Congress would approve personally of a sales tax if permitted to have it used as an offset for income taxes now paid by the individuals and companies with which Senators and Members may have an interest, but representing as we do those who are less able to pay and would be compelled to pay a manufacturer's tax to relieve those best able to pay, I submit there is but one fair and just course to take if we would properly represent the views of the majority of those who have given us places of responsibility in Congress.

I am not offering arguments affecting the sales tax either for or against, but have been urged to resubmit some brief arguments offered last year on the same subject. This I do with the understanding that although the matter occupies a number of pages of the RECORD, it can be properly offered to explain support and action of every Senator and Member who opposes the manufacturer's tax.

As the arguments of the latter are carried in the newspapers and magazines which reported a shortage in 1932 of $80,000,000 loss to the Government from mail carriage, and as they are exempt from any special taxes, which it has been urged could properly be added, I trust that the usual harangue about the expense in the RECORD by printing and franking privileges accorded Members may be temporarily forgotten. If not, other facts can be submitted in the matter of interest to taxpayers who pay the bills.

In response to repeated requests made as late as yesterday, I quote from my remarks of March 12, 1932, which contain statements that may be an answer and give a fairly good understanding of the position taken by opponents of the manufacturers' tax when the proposal was actively supported by President Harding and Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon when the latter made it a condition for consideration. The following letter explains the amount collectible under the proposed 2-cent increased cigarette tax:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 7, 1933.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: For the Secretary of the Treasury, receipt is acknowledged of your letter of December 22, 1932.

The tax collections on cigarettes during the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 were as follows:

	Small cigarettes	Large cigarettes
1931	$358,915,187.84	$45,815.64
1932	317,533,080.02	31,659.71

The present tax rates on cigarettes are: For cigarettes weighing not more than 3 pounds per 1,000 (small cigarettes), $3 per thousand; for cigarettes weighing more than 3 pounds (large cigarettes), $7.20 per thousand.

An increase in the tax rate on small cigarettes of 2 cents per package of 20 would amount to $1 per thousand. The additional revenue from such an increase would probably be approximately $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1934. * * *

Very truly yours,

JAMES M. DOUGLAS,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

Following the general discussion of a sales tax above stated, I am furnishing the committee the last information available from the legislative reference service as to sales taxes which recently have been adopted by the several States and which in many cases levy a direct tax on necessities affecting the average wage earner and farmer, thereby placing a double burden if additional Federal sales taxes should be placed in this bill as urged by their proponents at this time.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, May 22, 1933.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your letter of May 16 concerning the States that have adopted the sales tax, I send with this a typewritten statement, Gross Income and General Sales Taxes, prepared by Mr. Raymond B. Manning, a member of the Legislative Reference Service staff; 1933 legislation is so recent that much of it has not yet been printed, so that we have been obliged to depend upon other sources for the information.

Very respectfully,

H. H. B. MEYER,
Director Legislative Reference Service.

GROSS INCOME AND GENERAL SALES TAXES

Arizona: Laws 1933, H.B. 146. (Held unconstitutional by Maricopa County Court, Apr. 1, 1933.)

Rate: One half of 1 percent on gross income of mines, factories, farmers, wholesalers, jobbers, gas companies, electric companies (industrial sales), telephone companies, telegraph companies, railroads, pipe lines, and motor lines; 2 percent on gross incomes of retailers, electric companies (domestic sales), and all other businesses, professions, and callings not exempt.

Principal exemptions: $1,200; also, banks, building and loan associations, nonprofit organizations, and gasoline sales.

Connecticut: General Statutes, 1930, section 1340–1351. (Some authorities exclude this act because of its limited application.)

Rate: $1 for each $1,000 of gross income of unincorporated manufacturers or retail merchants; $0.25 for each $1,000 of gross income of unincorporated wholesale merchants.

Delaware: Revised Code 1915, section 196; Laws, 1917, chapter 11; 1919, chapter 23. (Some authorities exclude these acts because of their limited application.)

Rate: One fiftieth of 1 percent on gross receipts of manufacturers; 10 cents on each $100 of purchases of wholesalers and retailers.

Rate: 20 cents on each $100 of purchases of grain, fruit, and vegetable wholesalers.

Georgia: A 1929 act in Georgia expired by its own terms on December 31, 1931.

Illinois: Laws 1932, Ex. 4, page 17.

Until July 1, 1933, counties may tax retailers at the rate of 1 percent of retail selling prices.

A 1933 State-wide law was held unconstitutional by the State supreme court.

Indiana: Laws 1933, H.B. 513.

Rate: One fourth of 1 percent on gross income of timber producers, mines, factories, farmers, wholesalers, and jobbers. One percent on gross income of gas companies, electric companies, telephone companies, telegraph companies, railroads, pipe lines, motor lines, other public utilities, banks, building and loan associations, insurance companies not paying a 1-percent premium tax, and also income from professional services, personal services, retail sales, sales of real estate, income from investments, etc.

Principal exemptions: $1,000; also nonprofit organizations.

Kentucky: Acts 1930, chapter 142.

Rate: 0.05 percent on first $400,000 of gross retail sales; 0.1 percent on next $100,000; 0.25 percent on next $100,000; 0.4 percent on next $100,000; 0.55 percent on next $100,000; 0.7 percent on next $100,000; 0.85 percent on next $100,000; 1 percent on all over $1,000,000.

Principal exemptions: Garden and farm sales.

Mississippi: Laws 1932, chapter 90 and chapter 91. (Effective until June 30, 1934.)

Rate: One eighth of 1 percent on gross income of wholesalers; one fourth of 1 percent on gross income of factories; 1 percent on gross income of makers of brick, tile, sewer pipe, cement and its products, clay products, and bottled soft drinks, and sellers of automobiles, electricity and gas for industrial purposes, contractors; 2 percent on gross income of mines, timber producers, all public utilities, and all other professions and occupations subject to privilege taxes; 2½ percent on producers of natural gas.

Principal exemptions: $1,200; also places of amusement (subject to separate special tax) and nonprofit organizations.

New Mexico: Laws 1933, chapter 73. (Apparently aimed at chain stores.)

Rate: $10 when gross annual sales of retail merchants do not exceed $3,000; $15 when between $3,000 and $10,000; $20 when between $10,000 and $20,000; $50 when between $20,000 and $50,000; $75 when between $50,000 and $75,000; $125 when between $75,000 and $100,000; $250 when between $100,000 and $150,000; $650 when between $150,000 and $200,000; $1,250 when between $200,000 and $300,000; $1,950 when between $300,000 and $400,000; $1,950 plus $25 per $1,000 on all sales above $400,000.

Principal exemptions: Sales of liquor, oil, gas, and other motor fuel.

New York: Laws 1933, chapter 281.

Rate: 1 percent on retail sales.

Principal exemptions: $5,000 (not allowed when sales exceed $20,000); also sales of food, gasoline, electricity, gas, steam, and water.

North Carolina: Laws 1933.

Rate: 3 percent on retail purchases of all merchandise. Highest levy not to exceed $10.

Principal exemptions: Essential foods, meats, milk, flour, meal, molasses, sugar, salt, and coffee.

North Dakota: Laws 1933, S.B. 315. (Effective until June 30, 1935.)

Rate: One eighth of 1 percent on sales of wholesale bakeries, wholesale dealers in soft drinks or tires; one fourth of 1 percent on sales of other wholesalers and manufactures; 1 percent on sales of manufacturers of pottery, draintile, brick and cement, lignite mined, electricity (for industrial use), and sales by contractors; 2 percent on retail sales of tangible personal property, electricity (for domestic use), and gross income from professional services.

Oklahoma: Laws 1933.

Rate: Probably 2 percent on virtually all sales (at retail?).

Principal exemption: Food and clothing valued at less than $8.

Oregon: Laws 1933, chapter 400. (To be submitted to referendum, July 21, 1933; effective until June 30, 1935.)

Rate: Three tenths of 1 percent on gross income of wholesalers and publishers; 2 percent on gross income of retailers and gross income from services rendered.

Principal exemptions: $600; also salaries and wages, insurance premiums, sales of gasoline, and sales by growers and producers of farm products and livestock for resale.

Pennsylvania: West's Statutes 1920, § 14727–14729; Laws 1929, p. 1709.

Rate: 1 mill on volume of business transacted by retailers; one half mill on volume of business transacted by wholesalers other than those processing or curing meats; one fourth mill on volume of goods exchanged.

The 1932 emergency relief sales tax act levying 1 percent on sales expired by its own terms on February 28, 1933.

South Dakota: Laws 1933, senate bill 101.

Rate: One fourth of 1 percent on gross income of manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers; one half of 1 percent on gross income of livestock raisers, sellers, etc.; 1 percent on gross income of all other businesses and professions and all salaries and wages not in excess of $2,000; 1½ percent on salaries and wages between $2,000 and $5,000; 2 percent on salaries and wages over $5,000.

Principal exemptions—insurance companies, express companies, and nonprofit organizations.

Utah: Laws 1933, house bill 218 (effective until April 1, 1935, unless made inoperative before that time by proclamation of the Governor).

Rate: Three fourths of 1 percent on retail sales, sales of property, services furnished by public utilities, meals served to the public, and admission to places of amusement; 5 percent on sales of malt sirups, etc.

Vermont: Laws 1933, house bill 115 (apparently aimed at chain stores).

Rate: One eighth of 1 percent on retail merchants' gross annual sales between $50,000 and $100,000; one fourth of 1 percent on next $100,000; one half of 1 percent on next $300,000; 1 percent on next $250,000; 1½ percent on next $250,000; 2 percent on next $250,000; 2½ percent on next $250,000; 3 percent on next $250,000; 3½ percent on next $250,000; 4 percent on all over $2,000,000.

Virginia: Tax Code 1930, section 188. (Some authorities exclude this act because of its limited application.)

Rate: 20 cents per $100 of merchants' purchases between $2,000 and $100,000; 10 cents per $100 on all in excess of $100,000.

Washington: Laws 1933, House bill 92 (effective until June 30, 1935).

Rates: One fifth of 1 percent on gross income of wholesalers and jobbers; one fourth of 1 per cent on manufacturers, newspapers, and periodicals; three tenths of 1 percent on most severances; two fifths of 1 percent on banks and building and loan associations; one half of 1 per cent on retailers, electric interurban railroads, street railways, and local motor lines; 1 percent on oil, natural gas, outdoor advertising, and radiobroadcasting; 1½ percent on steam railroads, highway transportation companies, other public utilities, theaters, and places of amusement; 2 percent on manufactured gas, express companies, car companies, stockbrokers, security houses, and finance companies; 3 percent on water companies; 5 percent on societies of authors, composers, and publishers who collect fees.

Principal exemptions: Nonprofit organizations and insurance companies.

West Virginia: Code 1931, chapter 11, article 13.

Rate: One twentieth of 1 percent on gross income of wholesalers and jobbers; one fifth of 1 percent on retailers; twenty-one one hundredths of 1 percent on manufacturers; three tenths of 1 percent on banks, contractors, and other business not specifically taxed by this act; two fifths of 1 percent on street railroads and other public utilities; forty-two one hundredths of 1 percent on coal mined; forty-five one hundredths of 1 percent on limestone, other mineral products, and timber; three fifths of 1 percent on telephone, telegraph, express, and electric companies; 1 percent on oil, steam railroads, pipe lines, and amusements; 1 17/20 percent on natural gas.

Principal exemptions: $10,000; also insurance companies, mutual savings banks, nonprofit organizations.

Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to reprint some of the arguments and offer some of the evidence placed before the House a dozen years ago when a sales tax was threatened and nearly passed by the House because of the difficulty in placing before Members the illusive arguments so easily and frequently made by proponents of the tax. The vast amount involved in any such tax and permanence of its place on the tax rolls if once adopted justifies a very brief reminder of evidence and arguments submitted in the past. I quote from the RECORD of March 17, 1932:

WHO IS DEMANDING A SALES TAX? A TAX ON THE NECESSITIES OF EVERY CONSUMER TO RAISE $600,000,000 SHOULD BE DEFEATED AND A SUBSTITUTE TAX PLACED ON THOSE BEST ABLE TO PAY

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, day before yesterday a letter to my colleagues gave citations to speeches in 1921 and 1922 against the sales tax then before Congress. Yesterday I was stopped by a colleague on the way to the Capitol, who said he had gone to the Congressional Library and examined the RECORD of those dates—and, more remarkably, had read the speeches—with profit. I inserted remarks including extracts from speech of December 22, 1931, bearing directly on the sales tax and including data on the Canadian sales-tax proposals then before Congress.

Yesterday I listened to a splendid talk by Representative Davis, of Tennessee, against the sales tax, delivered before a handful of Members, and before the close of the session only 20 Members—equally divided politically—were on the floor. I have seen Senators "orating" to empty benches on different occasions, so I believe speeches and physical strength can be saved by "remarks" that carry the same information.

The sales tax bills before Congress in 1921 and 1922 carried estimates of a billion dollars. The bill before us has a $600,000,000 sales-tax item; and although reported unanimously by 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee, second to none in Congress in ability and power, I feel certain that the $600,000,000 sales-tax item, composing 60 percent of revenues proposed to be raised, will be stricken from the bill, possibly by the House; but, if not, by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the able presentation of a sales-tax argument by the distinguished Democratic leader today, a personal friend and colleague of many years' standing. I would be the last to seek to answer him or any other member of the committee.

I do venture to suggest that men of great wealth—and Mr. Hurley is, I understand, in the highest brackets—will one and all be relieved from income taxes when the sales tax is substituted for an income tax that is proposed by Mr. Kahn, Mr. Hearst, Mr. Bache, and scores of others whose names in many cases appear in these remarks with their efforts to substitute a sales tax for an income tax.

No criticism is found in that course, excepting full publicity should be given of motives that may properly lie with those who would be ready to shift the taxes onto the shoulders of the consumer by a consumption tax.

The arguments here offered against the bill may not be persuasive so as materially to affect the result, but the opinions of expert tax authorities quoted of organizations in Canada and this country opposed to a consumption tax are unanswerable and should help strike from the bill the $600,000,000 sales-tax item.

That is a result devoutly to be wished for by the vast multitude least able to pay, and I doubt if the President endorses this item, basing that opinion on his familiarity with taxation principles and strong common sense, not on any inside information so frequently voiced by others.

SALES-TAX ISSUE THE SAME AS IN 1921

In 1921 the issue was the same. Then it seemed that the influence for the bill would be overwhelming, but we defeated it in the committee. Now, with slight hearings and less publicity, the committee unanimously reports a $600,000,000 consumption tax in the revenue bill. Let me express appreciation for the valuable work of my colleague, Representative LaGuardia, whose opposition in general debate is forceful, convincing, and logical. Also, in answer to charges that Congress and Members generally have been silent on extravagance, let me say, when the flood control bill, in the Seventieth Congress, passed the Senate with 2 hours' debate, carrying an estimated billion and one half dollars for a wide-spread reservoir system covering condemnation of many millions of acres for flooding purposes and extravagant plans, I was then a member of the House Flood Control Committee.

Representative LaGuardia was called to aid and for 4 days we exposed the Senate flood-control bill acting on the advice of Chief of Engineers Jadwin and after conference with President Coolidge. On a vote that assured sustaining of a Presidential veto, the President compelled a compromise measure finally agreed to at $318,000,000 and a saving of over a billion dollars in that one bill by action of the House and President.

Six hundred million dollars in revenue can be raised by suggestions that I will hereafter offer, I trust without presumption, for any revenue bill should be properly balanced and not drafted on the floor by amendments. That is a proper function of the committee but in its surprising recommendation of a consumption tax, I fear a flood of protests from interests proposed to be taxed, caused the committee to return to the iniquitous sales tax because no organization had yet appeared specifically against the tax. I submit substitute revenues can be found to balance the Budget, but if not easily available the Government is not going "hay wire" nor bankrupt because of that fact.

BALANCING OF BUDGET DESIRABLE BUT NOT IMPERATIVE

Short-term securities until the present world-wide slump is relieved will, if necessary, meet the situation, and I say this with full knowledge of its threatened effect. I am somewhat familiar with Treasury pronouncements, mistakes, and sales-tax recommendations in the past. They are not to be taken literally in every case as they have been frequently disproved but I am equally in favor of balancing of the Federal Budget. I suggest some measures that may have been considered, but if so should be reconsidered in preference to a sales tax which taxes the necessities of every consumer in the land through increased prices.

Let the Budget be balanced, not by a sales tax but by some of the following proposals: A gift tax may well be started, not at 1½ percent but at 10 percent, which would reach a large percentage of gifts and should reach to 30 percent maximum on large estates. Even a maximum that will graduate a return of at least 20 percent would not be excessive. By raising the estate tax with smaller exemptions up to 40 percent on large estates, if need be, and repealing the entire 80 percent State credit to the States, a tax still less than that of England might help to meet Budget requirements. By taxing cars and trucks, imported oil—now free entry—a larger tax on stock and bond transfers, on bank checks, and, if need be, on cigarettes and on innumerable items, though protested, will be more equitable and just than a "sales" tax or "consumption" tax or "spending" tax which in its blood-sucking-leech effect reduces the income of every consumer in the land by adding the tax indirectly to the price ordinarily collected from necessities he must buy for himself and family, to exist.

This subject, as stated, has been with Congress before and, without professing any expert knowledge of the tax, I submit extracts from several prized tributes that are not claimed to have been deserved, although the speakers and writers believed so, apparently.

Senator La Follette in Senate debate, RECORD, page 7371, November 5, 1921:

"Mr. President, the (1921) sales tax was practically defeated over in the House, largely under the leadership of a Member of Congress from Wisconsin, Representative FREAR."

Of course, I did not merit especial credit for a result in which all helped, but another word from 1921 is offered because of the great organization represented then and now against the tax. From Hon. Edward Keating (editor Labor, 2,000,000 circulation):

"MY DEAR MR. FREAR: You are entitled to practically all the glory for defeat of the sales tax * * *."

And from an editorial in that paper of August 23, 1924:

"More than any other man he was responsible for the defeat of the Mellon (sales) tax plan and for the adoption of a substitute which lightened the burdens of 3,000,000 taxpayers."

Similar words from President Howard, of the American Farm Bureau Federation; Secretary Charles A. Lyman, National Board of Farm Organizations; Akerson, of the Grange; and others indicate the character of organizations then marshaled against the iniquitous consumption tax then before Congress, and that evidence then submitted was practically undisputed by any student of taxation.

Although time is limited, like opposition is reasonably certain to be aroused against the $600,000,000 sales tax contained in the pending bill. Not because of unfounded prejudice but because every leading tax authority is opposed to the principle of taxing consumers on necessities they buy in order to relieve those best able to pay who are more strongly organized and hope to substitute a sales tax for high income-tax rates.

WHERE REAL TAXES ARE PAID

Mr. Speaker, those who denounce the new tax bill because it makes a heavy dent in their income will not move to England or France or Germany to get tax relief. In the last-named countries they would pay the hated consumption tax that the Treasury is trying to unload onto the people for the second or third time, and in addition the Englishman pays several times as much for the privilege of living in the old mother country and far more than that in Germany.

From last night's Star I clipped a brief comparison which I have not checked with official records, but if approximately true, the American taxpayer will never get farther away from New York than the Statue of Liberty, excepting for a brief trip abroad to learn what a lucky fellow he is to live in the United States.

The article is so interesting and well worth studying when income-tax payers are wearing crepe on both sleeves in these days of tax mourning that I insert it for your perusal. It reads as follows:

"In the United States a married man with one dependent child and a net income of $2,000 pays no Federal income tax now and would not pay any under the provisions of the new revenue bill in Congress.

"A citizen of Germany, with the same income and dependents, pays a tax of $215; an Italian pays $218; a Frenchman, $104; and an Englishman, $63.

"More pronounced is the severity of European levies on the middle- and high-income classes. For example, the German with a net income of $5,000 a year contributes $989 to his government in income tax alone. The loyal subject of King Emmanuel digs up $717; the Frenchman, $104; and an Englishman, $63.

"The married American with one child and an income of $5,000, under present regulations, pays $16.50 Federal income tax. If the new revenue bill is enacted as drawn he would pay $29.50. In 1924 an American of the same status paid $42.50.

"The residents of 28 of the 48 States are now required to pay a State income tax in addition to the Federal levy. The State taxes, however, average considerably lower than the Federal. Consequently, a person with a $5,000 income, living in a State which imposes an income tax, probably wouldn't pay a total of $50. That would be only one fourteenth of what an Englishman pays.

"Particularly heavy are British levies on high incomes. A married man with one child and an income of $10,000 in Great Britain pays $1,800.

"In the United States he now pays $123. He paid $204 in 1924 and would pay $154 in 1933 under the new revenue bill.

"The same man with an income of $100,000 pays $48,000 in Great Britain and $16,245 in this country. In 1924 he paid $22,000 and under the new bill he would pay about $26,000.

"This measure grants an exemption of $1,000 to single men, $2,500 to married men, and $400 for each dependent. Great Britain's exemptions are $485 for a single man; $730 for a married man, $245 for the first dependent child, and $195 for each other child.

"For Americans who 'view with alarm' the projected boost in income taxes, Government financial experts cite the prospect of tax-rate reductions and increased exemptions such as have been made heretofore when the Treasury enjoyed a surplus."

NINETY-FIVE PER CENT OF FARMERS AND LABORERS DO NOT NOW PAY ANY FEDERAL TAX

It may be proper to intersperse at this point the fact that while constant protests are received from agriculture, labor, and other individuals and organizations against existing Federal taxes which they believe they are called upon to pay, not 5 percent of the farmers or laborers in the United States pay any income taxes to the Federal Government, and that is the largest source of direct taxation.

Existing law provides an exemption of $3,500 for a married couple, and the percentage of farmers and laborers receiving over that net amount of income is small. The pending bill lowers the exempt net income to $2,500 per couple. Estate taxes, largely reached in the higher brackets, gift taxes now proposed, and other existing Federal tax burdens, or those proposed, will not affect the average individual. Indirect taxes on a very limited proportion of goods imported, with small excise taxes on tobaccos and cigarettes, are paid by all, but heavy taxes borne by the average farmer and laborer living in cities comes from local taxes for schools, streets, town, county, city, and State government, all of which, directly or indirectly, are paid by the residents of the State. Indirectly, when no property is owned by renters, the rental payment goes to cover taxes and other expenses of the owner.

A popular misconception exists as to where the Federal taxes are laid, and although the local resident pays far higher taxes in proportion of ability to pay than the average income-tax payer living in the cities, those taxes are local and the Government receives no return, but, on the contrary, contributes toward highways and other State improvements that give employment and aid to labor within the State.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to express some additional views beyond what was stated in the RECORD of Friday, March 11, when on pages 6018–6036 I submitted unanswerable arguments offered by many of the ablest men and tax experts in the country against a sales tax when that same question was last before the House. In that statement (in Friday's RECORD, March 11) will be found opinions of men like Professor Seligman, of New York, known throughout the world as an international financial and tax expert; Arthur A. Ballantine, attorney, New York City, formerly solicitor of internal revenue, whose opinion you will find on page 6024, where he says:

"I believe that this idea of a sales tax, a tax collected everywhere, falling on no one, is a will-o'-the-wisp which has floated over this field of taxation and which is in danger of luring business men who approach Congress in an effort to get really beneficial changes into futile action instead of constructive action.

"I believe that this committee, by the very careful and exhaustive consideration which it has given to the advocates of this plan and its careful thought as to conclusions, has done much to dissipate this myth and to direct the efforts of business men into practical channels instead of down a pathway which leads to futility."

Another expert witness quoted was Charles A. Andrews, whose careful study of the subject on behalf of the national industrial conference board as a tax expert caused him to say:

"We started in upon the assumption that we were going to work out something in the form of a sales tax. We invited various well-informed people to come before us. We reached out and got printed matter and manuscripts; we made investigations; and slowly but steadily the committee was driven to the inevitable conclusion that it, representing a large body of business men, could not bring before this conference a recommendation for any form of sales tax, except as the same related to a few specific articles, suggestions as to which we have made and which have been referred to by Mr. Armitage.

"We haven't the nerve, as good citizens of the country—which we believe we are, and are trying to be—to say to a body of business men in this country, who are suggesting that business be relieved from a billion dollars of excess-profits tax, that we propose a tax which will cause the billion to be paid by the ultimate consumer. That is such a violent divergence from the principle of payment upon the basis of ability to pay that we cannot ask this body of business men to get behind that sort of a tax."

Mr. H. C. McKenzie, New York tax expert for the American Farm Bureau Federation, said:

"I want to take the opportunity to emphasize the farmer's objections to a general sales tax, which have been voiced by our president, Mr. Howard, and to call your attention to just two or three things briefly. * * *

"Ninety percent or ninety-five percent of that tax will be paid out of the living wage, if the contention of the proponents of the sales tax is correct; and I want to say that the farmers who are represented in the American Farm Bureau Federation will never in the world stand for that proposition."

Mr. George P. Hampton, managing director of the Farmers' National Council, quoted on page 6025 of the RECORD of March 11, says:

"A retail sales tax and other sales taxes and all similar taxes on food, clothing, and shelter, called consumption taxes, must be paid chiefly by the workers on the farm, in factories, mines, and transportation, millions of whom are getting less than the minimum wage necessary to maintain a family on a decent American standard."

Mr. Speaker, presidents of farm organizations and of labor organizations, both in this country and in Canada, are quoted at length in that speech. These men, I submit, have a better understanding than those who have given the subject slight study or who may vote for this bill because it is reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

WHAT SALES-TAX WITNENSSES WERE HEARD?

Let me call your attention to one significant fact. The Ways and Means Committee at that time heard about 350 witnesses on the entire tax bill, as found in 1,230 pages of hearings. Of all those witnesses and all those pages of testimony, only 15 pages apparently were given to the only two witnesses who testified before the committee on the sales tax. This is significant, because while 60 percent of the entire amount to be raised in the $1,000,000,000 bill, or $600,000,000, is to be covered by the sales tax, only two witnesses, as stated, were called to testify on the sales tax. Dr. Adams of my home State of Wisconsin, a man of exceptional ability whom I have known for many years, and Mr. Alvord, formerly a clerk of the Ways and Means Committee, and afterwards an employee of the Treasury.

If 60 percent of the entire bill, amounting to $600,000,000, has been written into the bill with 15 pages of testimony before the committee by 2 witnesses out of 350 witnesses, it is well that we ascertain what those 2 witnesses have said in favor of any sales tax. On page 260 of the hearings I quote:

"Mr. DOUGHTON. I believe you stated that you encountered very little criticism or opposition toward the sales tax in your investigation in Canada. To what extent did you discuss this matter with the consumers of the articles on which the sales tax is assessed?

"Dr. ADAMS. I am very glad that you asked that question. I did not talk this question over with representatives of labor organizations or agricultural associations or, if there be any, of the consumer. I might have found a great deal of criticism there.

"Mr. DOUGHTON. That is where the criticism would naturally be.

"Dr. ADAMS. Yes; and that is a real defect in my inquiries. I did want to talk to them, but I did not have time."

Here is the principal witness on the sales tax who testified before the committee a few days ago, on page 260 of the hearings, that he did not talk to a single consumer who pays the tax during several days he was in Canada studying the tax. His study apparently was directed particularly to matters of administration and not to the merits or justification for the sales tax.

NO SALES TAX JUSTIFIED FOR ONLY 2 YEARS

Now listen to additional testimony by one of the ablest tax experts of the country, given a few days ago before the committee:

"Dr. ADAMS. I have one definite conviction. Whether you should have a sales tax or not is a question for you gentlemen, largely a question of policy, but this, I think, is a common-sense conclusion, that it is not worth your while to adopt a Canadian sales tax for a short period of time, because to put it over you ought to have an administrative machine so well built up and so large that you would not be justified in creating it for a temporary tax of 2 or 3 years" (p. 260, hearings).

What did the committee do on page 250 of the committee bill? Here is the provision:

"No sale or importation after June 30, 1934, shall be taxable under this bill."

In other words, that limitation was written into the bill with full expectation of continuing the tax in order to relieve the income tax, or else the committee disregarded the evidence of its only two witnesses who said Congress would not be justified to create a manufacturers' tax for a temporary tax of 2 or 3 years.

On page 262, Mr. Chindblom, of the committee, said:

"Mr. CHINDBLOM. Do you know of any other country which has a system similar to that in Canada?

"Dr. ADAMS. No, sir; I do not. You know Austria has a system by which they attempt to eliminate pyramiding by varying the rate, but that is not the Canadian tax."

Here is the best expert that could be called by the committee who gives his testimony on the Canadian tax which we are asked to endorse. After a brief visit of several days he found a tax not similar to that of any other country, which he refused to pass on as a matter of policy, and ought not be taken over as a temporary tax of 2 or 3 years.

The committee would find itself out of court in a legal proceeding on that testimony of its chief witness.

Now comes the second witness, the only one aside from Dr. Adams, who testifies in detail regarding this tax, formerly an employee of the committee and afterward of the Treasury Department. Why he was sent to Canada and who sent him for 4 days to become an expert on the Canadian sales tax does not appear from the record, nor does he volunteer any expert testimony. On page 264:

"Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Alvord, have you any idea why the Canadians did not make a list of the articles which are taxed, rather than to set out a list of exemptions?

"Mr. ALVORD. In reading the act I am inclined to say that a list of the articles taxed would not be so much larger than the list of articles exempt.

"Mr. ALDRICH. That is a general manufacturers' tax in name only.

"Mr. ALVORD. That is almost true; yet, sir, not quite, however. From the point of view of drafting a general law it is much easier to specify exemptions than inclusions."

This is the second expert's opinion of the Canadian law which he studied 4 days. Again, on the same page, he says:

"Mr. ALVORD. I do not know whether Dr. Adams went into this or not, but I think he agrees with me—if you adopt a sales tax without having the elastic administrative machinery, I am afraid your sales tax would be practically inoperative.

"Mr. TREADWAY. Do you mean by elasticity, the judgment of an official?

"Mr. ALVORD. The basic principle of the administration of the Canadian sales tax, as I understand it, is that there, either as a matter of law or as a matter of fact, the administrative decision is final."

Again he says, on page 265:

"Mr, ALVORD. If you are to consider the list of exemptions that the Canadian sales tax has, it means that you practically have got to write a tariff act. I have been through the 1922 act and the 1930 act, and you gentlemen have been through many others, I imagine that the pressure would be just about the same."

Again this second witness, with 4 days' experience in Canada, says, on page 266—and remember he was formerly a clerk of the committee, afterward an employee of the Treasury Department, and no one knows who sent him to Canada, so far as the record discloses—

"Mr. ALVORD. I agree with Dr. Adams that as an emergency measure I think it would be subject to very serious consideration as to whether it would be worth while to interject the entire machinery for a short period of time."

Every Member, I submit, should study this tax expert's opinion of an emergency sales tax proposed by several Members in H.R. 5755 before us.

Yet this bill (1932) proposes against the expert testimony of Dr. Adams and Mr. Alvord that it shall remain in force for only 2 years. Is anyone seeking to mislead Congress, and who drew that 2 years' limitation and why?

Again, on page 266, Mr. Alvord says in response to a question by Mr. Crisp:

"Mr. CRISP. With the knowledge you have and as an American citizen, do you favor the levying of a general sales tax?

"Mr. ALVORD. At the present time; no, sir."

Here seems to be the length, breadth, and scope of Mr. Alvord's opportunity to study the effect of the sales tax as shown on page 267:

"Mr. ALVORD. We started in with the minister of finance, rather briefly. We then went to the commissioner of excises, who is a Civil Service appointee and who has been in the service a long time, and he called in two of his assistants. They were the men who primarily had the job of administering the tax. We spent practically an entire day with them in going over their administration. I think those are the only persons we discussed the matter with in the administration. Then we spent the remaining 3 days of our visit up there discussing the matter with manufacturers, manufacturers' representatives, and with attorneys."

No inquiry among consumers. I will furnish that testimony on the 1921 law.

On such testimony the committee reported in favor of a $600,000,000 sales tax, to exist no longer than to June 30, 1934, and this last provision was opposed by both of the experts called for advice.

The evidence of witnesses who accompanied the Hearst $10,000 junket trip to Canada was inserted in the RECORD. Some of those witnesses were opposed to the sales tax, even on the statement of officials who alone were consulted. No consumers, apparently, had any voice at any time in the matter. The officials were discussing their duties, and naturally liked their jobs. I speak of this particularly, because in my speech of March 11, 1932, on pages 6032–3, I discussed at length the Canadian sales tax and cited labor organizations and others at St. Johns, New Brunswick; Hamilton, Ontario; Toronto, Ottawa; and elsewhere—all vigorously opposed to the sales tax then in force.

A sales tax at 2½-percent rate, not pyramided, to produce $600,000,000 would amount to $24,000,000,000 in purchases, but all these sales are expected to bring a profit to manufacturers, jobbers, wholesalers, and retailers. To take an extreme case, if a hundred percent is added to the sales price or 950 percent to the tax, as quoted from committee hearings on page 6020 of the RECORD of March 11 last (testimony of ex-Senator Hardwick), it would double $24,000,000,000 in purchases to $48,000,000,000.

This would not ordinarily occur, but it is reasonably certain that the 2½ percent with all these profits added would be increased to possibly 10 or 20 percent before the ultimate consumer paid the bill, and that would be 4 to 8 times the rate fixed by the committee, and would mean an added tax 4 to 8 times the $600,000,000 tax collected. Possibly $2,000,000,000 and more additional would be paid by the ultimate consumer to bring to the Government $600,000,000 in tax receipts as estimated by the committee. That tax has been reported to the House on the testimony of two witnesses, both of whom urged against enactment of any sales tax for the short period of 2 years.

Let me now quote from a speech made in the House February 21, 1922, when the bonus bill was up for consideration:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D.C., February 16, 1922.

"DEAR COLLEAGUE: The proposal to finance the soldiers' bill with a consumption tax means to tax the living wage of labor, when the average man is receiving less than $500 pre-war purchasing power per family, and it taxes the farmer, whose average annual earning is $219 pre-war purchasing power, on all that his family consumes. In Canada it is estimated it increases cost of living from $30 to $50 per family, due to pyramiding of prices.

"Clothing, shoes, food, gasoline, machinery, everything not specifically exempted, is increased in price from 2 to 10 times the amount of tax according to Canadian experience. Sugar, 10 cents per pound there last month, was 6 cents here, according to official reports, and articles exempted this year are included next year. Every man, woman, and child, whether working or out of employment, pays the increased price through this "painless sales tax." Rockefeller and thousands of multimillionaires pay the same tax, while a half billion dollar tax means $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 added prices to those who consume. The Washington Times says, "Wall Street welcomes it", and as $500,000,000 was recently exempted from excess profits, luxuries, and high surtaxes over the consumption there is a reason.

"All American farming and labor organizations are unanimous against the tax, and they represent 85 percent of the consumption tax that will be paid, according to witnesses. A leading Republican Member from New York said to me not 10 Republican Members from New York will be returned if we pass a general sales tax. A complete Waterloo occurred in Canada for the Conservatives, who repealed the excess-profits tax and enacted a general sales tax and a high tariff law. High prices were the issue.

"No general sales tax law was ever enacted in this country in time of peace. No appropriation was ever before hung up with a special-tax tin can tied to it. It is a gold-brick tax to the soldier, who would help pay his own bonus, whether he has a job or not. Not one witness for a sales tax came before the committee to favor it, although many appeared against it. A sales tax is opposed by practically every disinterested tax expert and by labor and agriculture here and in Canada, where it has been tried and repudiated at the polls. In the RECORD of January 3, 1922, page 832, will be found conclusive testimony of many witnesses in this country and in Canada discrediting a consumption tax. Who is it asks for it and who pays for special trains and propaganda that covers local papers in a hope eventually to substitute this tax for the income tax now paid?

"The last bonus bill struck out a consumption tax in conference before it passed the House. Senators tell me the tax cannot pass the Senate. A bonus bill will pass the House, but if an open discussion is had, it will not contain a consumption tax.

"Very truly yours,

"JAMES A. FREAR."

Attention is called to a significant part of that speech in 1922 which ought not to be overlooked by any Member of Congress. When Canada woke up to the fact that a sales tax had been tagged on to the people the latter took action. I called attention in the RECORD of February 21, 1922, to a complete turnover of the Canadian Parliament which occurred at the election December 6, 1921:

"Prior to the election the Parliament stood—Conservatives, 120; Liberals, 84; Progressives, 14. The election gave Conservatives 51, Liberals 117, Progressives 65; or an opposition vote of 177 to 51, compared with a prior Conservative majority in a vote of Conservatives 120 to 98."

Quoting further from my speech—

"This tremendous overturning of the Canadian Parliament, according to my advices, was occasioned by a high protective tariff and a burdensome manufacturers' sales tax like that which is now being urged by committee members."

Let me continue as to politics, which is certainly as important as any wet-and-dry issue, because it is a burden upon the necessities of the people which they resented in Canada according to the following testimony:

"CANADIAN POLITICS

"From many letters of denunciation of the Canadian sales tax I quote the following as to the political issue with labor organizations:

"In a letter dated Toronto, Canada, December 13, from Toronto District Labor Council, it is stated:

"'While organized wage earners have not given any official expression regarding the sales tax, the general discussions on the political situation during the last few weeks leave no doubt as to their opinion. This system of taxation was soundly condemned by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement officially. * * *

"'TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,
"'JAMES WATT, Secretary.'"

"The foregoing is a square expression of labor in Canada on the subject of a sales tax and of its political significance when it was 'condemned by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement.'

"FARMERS MAKE POLITICAL ISSUE IN CANADA

"From the United Farmers of Alberta the following statement is significant of the political issue last election, when practically all of western Canada was wrested from the Conservative Party:

"CALGARY, CANADA, December 31, 1921.

"President Wood has referred to me your letter of December 6 re sales tax. I may say that there is a very strong feeling against the sales tax, and that it was vigorously attacked by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent Federal general election.

"The enclosed pamphlet entitled 'Sales Tax Hits the Poor Man,' (issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture) is, I think, a summary of the arguments used against this tax during the campaign, while the Try Outs in Taxation also contains references to this matter. * * *

"I was interested to note that the sales tax in the United States is advocated by big business and financial interests, which fear the heavy income, excess-profits, and estate taxes. Exactly the same groups of interests advocated the tax in Canada, and you will note from the pamphlet Sales Tax Hits the Poor Man the representatives of the agricultural interests in this country were not consulted in any way in connection with the matter.

"Yours very truly,

"UNITED FARMERS OF ALBERTA,
"W. N. SMITH,
"Educational Department."

"The sales tax was 'vigorously attacked' by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent Canadian election. Results speak for themselves.

"WHAT CANADA DID

"Before the Ways and Means Committee Edward F. McGrady, speaking for the American Federation of Labor, said on February 3:

"'The members of our organization over in Canada joined with the farmers in protest against the sales tax, and at the last election on December 6 we were enabled to defeat all of those men who voted for a sales tax (p. 140).

* * * * * * *

"'You took off $450,000,000 from the corporations which made excess profits. * * * You reduced the surtaxes on incomes by the amount of $61,500,000. * * * In the last bill you repealed $60,000,000 in luxury taxes. * * *

"'It is an extremely dangerous proposition, and I predict if you impose a sales tax the people of this country will do what the people of Canada did when they had an opportunity—defeat everyone who voted for it (p. 141).'

"I am making no comment on this testimony taken before the committee excepting to disclose the political action taken by the people of Canada with reference to the Canadian manufacturers or sales tax.

"Another witness before the Ways and Means Committee, H. C. McKenzie, tax expert for the American Farm Bureau Federation, was asked:

"'Mr. OLDFIELD. Do you know personally that that (the Canadian sales tax) was an issue in the recent campaign in Canada?

"'Mr. MCKENZIE. Yes; it was an issue in the campaign, and the same interests that are opposed to the sales taxes and consumption taxes in this country opposed them in Canada also. Labor and the farmers are opposed to it there and were fighting it there.'

"As stated by Mr. McKenzie, the sales tax was vigorously attacked in Canada by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent general election. In order that it may not seem the opinion of labor in the letter on a sales tax was isolated, I again quote briefly from Canadian sources.

"From a number of letters the following indicates what the consumer thinks of the Canadian tax:

"ST. JOHNS TRADE AND LABOR COUNCIL,
"St. Johns, New Brunswick, December 12, 1921.

"* * * Yours of the 3d received, inquiring about the sales tax in force in Canada. * * * Briefly, the way the tax works is that each time an article is turned over or sold this tax is collected, and in these days of manufacturers, jobbers, wholesalers, retailers, and other middlemen it is easily seen where the tax lands us by the time the article reaches the consumer, for each time the article is sold the tax is collected and, of course, added to the next selling price, and a small tax of 1 or 1½ percent easily amounts up to possibly 10 percent or more in some cases.

"Fraternally yours,

"GEO. R. MELVIN, Secretary."

"A SEVERE TAX ON THE WAGE EARNER

"HAMILTON DISTRICT TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL,
"Hamilton, Ontario, December 26, 1921.

"* * * Re sales tax in Canada and its effects upon the wage earners, can only say that this tax falls with peculiar severity upon the wage earner. It is very much like a tariff, minus the protective benefits. It is passed on to the consumers in every instance. And as the working classes on a whole are the greatest consumers, they of necessity pay the greater share of the tax.

"This, however, is in strict accord with true capitalistic economics and administration. They are sternly opposed to all forms of direct taxation, which would mean that those who own approximately 85 percent of the wealth of the country would pay their just share of the taxes. This, of course, would never do. Hence the sales tax. Trusting that this information is answering your query,

"I am yours fraternally,

"[SEAL] "H. G. FOSTER, General Secretary."

"Again I quote from another letter:

"TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,
"Toronto, December 13, 1921.

"This tax was imposed to supersede the surplus-profits tax which was in operation during the later stages of the war.

"While organized wage earners have not given any official expression regarding the sales tax, the general discussions on the political situation during the last few weeks leave no doubt as to their opinion. This system of taxation was soundly condemned by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement, officially or otherwise.

"My information leads me to believe that the tax is imposed on the manufacturers' output, the increased cost being passed on to the dealers, and eventually the consumers pay the tax in increased prices. Unlike the income tax and business tax, which recognize more or less the principle of 'ability to pay', the sales tax applies to consumers in the purchase of commodities, and if the consumer cannot pay the increased price by reason of the tax he goes without the goods. This sales tax largely applies to the necessaries of life, hence you will readily understand why organized workers oppose such methods of taxation when surplus profits are untouched. I am further of the opinion that the great majority of our people are unaware of what this sales tax really means; they pay the increased price without knowledge of the amount, no mention being made concerning the tax; to put the whole matter shortly, legally flimflammed.

"Yours truly,

"TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,
"JAMES WATT, Secretary."

"'Legal flimflamming' is a name with which to entitle the proposed sales tax here. If its passage results in a political turnover like that experienced by Canada a few weeks ago, it will evidence a well-grounded universal prejudice against flimflam games.

LEGAL FLIMFLAMMING

"One other brief statement I quote from a communication dated Ottawa, December 2, that is more of a résumé of the tax than is covered by other correspondence. It says:

"OTTAWA, ONTARIO, December 2.

"Ottawa this week received, entertained, and introduced to the intricacies of its sales tax act a party comprising 47 Members of Congress, representing 30 different States, railway men, newspapermen, and others. They came as the guest of Mr. William Randolph Hearst, with Hon. Lester D. Volk, of New York, as head. * * * But while the members of the party studied the sales tax act from a variety of angles, your correspondent ventures the assertion that they did not receive nor consider facts with reference to its application to the consumer.

"I do not believe that in their examination of government statistics they found that a man with a wife and one child in Canada pays $18.66 every year as a result of this form of taxation; that a man with a wife and two children pays $24.88; that families of varying sizes pay on the following basis:

Man, wife, and 3 children	$31.10
Man, wife, and 4 children	37.32
Man, wife, and 5 children	43.54
Man, wife, and 6 children	49.76
Man, wife, and 7 children	55.98
Man, wife, and 8 children	62.20

"In other words, the sales tax in Canada adds to the living expenses of a family of ten $5 a month. Families of this size may be 'unfashionable', but those who are not particularly stylish feel it to the extent as it applies, as illustrated above. Bachelors are lucky!

"These figures are based upon official statements. Sales-tax collections for the 12 months ended October last amounted to $52,870,000, while our population is approximately 8,500,000. This means a per capita tax of $6.22 for every man, woman, and child in Canada yearly.

"The following table strikingly illustrates what income and sales tax combined mean to a Canadian as compared with a citizen of the United States:

Canada
Income—man, wife, and 2 children	$2,500.00
Income tax	4.00
Sales tax	24.88
Total	28.88
United States
Income—man, wife, and 2 children	2,500.00
Income tax	8.00
Total	8.00

"The sales tax in Canada is, above all else, a tax on consumers. The more you buy the more you pay. It is paid in the majority of cases not on one able to pay but in proportion as one must buy things. With a person of means it is entirely optional whether he buys expensive furniture, limousine, etc., but in buying articles of ordinary consumption the average person has no choice. We must buy to live, to exist, and as we buy we pay.

"The sales tax increases the cost of living. There can be no doubt about it. In Canada it is not a tax on luxuries; it is a tax on everything; and we must have necessities before we have luxuries.

"CANADIAN TAX AND THE FARMER

"In this country it can be safely said that organized labor and organized agricultural societies are overwhelmingly opposed to a sales tax, as I have shown by reputable witnesses. In Canada the organizations are not so closely formed, but from the foregoing it may well be deduced that labor in Canada is against a sales tax. It could not be otherwise. Agricultural interests in Canada are not for a sales tax.

"The Winnipeg Grain Growers' Guide put it that a sales tax 'is immensely pleasing to those who had to pay the excess-profits and income tax and who care little where the burden of taxation falls as long as it doesn't fall on them.'

"It says:

"'The people want justice in taxation before convenience, and there is precious little justice in this proposed tax on sales.'

"Admitting that the sales tax is finding great favor with financial interests across the border, it adds:

"'To those who are not unacquainted with the ways of financial interests, the mere fact that the proposition emanates from their councils is enough to provoke suspicion, and when it is affirmed that the tax is "passed along in small fractions and is finally paid by the consumer, practically without his knowledge, and the additions are so trifling as not materially to affect prices", that such a tax would raise more revenue than the country actually needs, and that its adoption would lead to repeal of the excess-profits tax and the income tax, one begins to detect the "nigger in the woodpile." It takes a wizard of finance to maintain that some $500,000,000 a year can be painlessly extracted from the people of Canada.'

"In the RECORDS of January 3 and January 27 I furnished many statements from agricultural organizations of Canada. These will not be repeated, but I add a statement issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture that every Representative in Congress may well read, because it gives the farmer's viewpoint of the manufacturers' sales tax, which, he declares, collects 53 percent of all the tax from farmers of Canada, because of their large purchases of things consumed and of things used, from shoes, sugar, and shirts to gasoline and machinery.

"The statement follows:

"'CANADIAN SALES TAX

"'SALES TAX HITS THE POOR MAN—AN EXAMINATION OF THE PRINCIPAL FEATURES OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S BUDGET FOR 1921–22

"'Issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture

"'The sales tax was the principal feature of the Federal budget for the fiscal year 1921–22, which was presented by the Minister of Finance, Sir Henry Drayton, before Parliament in May. By means of this tax the Federal Government expects to raise the additional revenue which is required to meet the increased expenditures of the present year, as compared with the revenue and expenditures of last year. It involves additional costs of living to every man, woman, and child in Canada, and treats them all alike, whether they be rich or poor, able to pay or not able to pay.

"'Therefore, the sales tax, which was first introduced in Canada during May 1920, is one that merits close study. This is especially true because it is intended to fall upon the great mass of the people, being levied, insofar as Canada is concerned, on a large number of the necessaries of life. It is thus primarily a consumption tax, which is another good reason why it should be thoroughly studied, for it is levied not in proportion to one's ability to pay but in proportion as one consumes. As first introduced, it was a tax of 1 percent on sales by the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler or jobber, who in turn collected from the retailer. On sales made direct by the manufacturers or producer to the retailer the rate was 2 percent. In 1921 the rate was increased to 1½ percent on sales by the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler or jobber; when the sale is made direct to the retailer the rate is 3 percent. Another tax of 1 percent is also collected on imports, the rate on such sales to the consumer being not less than 4 percent.

"'Taxes approximating to the sales tax were collected in Europe as far back as the Middle Ages, but coming down to the history of the last half century the sales tax made its appearance in Mexico nearly 40 years ago, during the regime of Dictator Porfirio Diaz. The finances of Mexico were then in a chaotic state; taxation, being very little understood, was only slightly discussed, and, as the Mexicans had to buy and sell, Diaz came to the conclusion that by taxing these absolutely necessary operations he could raise revenue, and he did.

"'The sales tax was next copied by the United States administration in the Philippine Islands. After the Spanish-American War, through which these islands passed to the United States, their business life was in a state of collapse; the Spanish market, on which they had depended largely, having been closed to them. Being desirous of bringing about free trade with the United States, the sales tax was introduced as a means of securing a substitute for the revenue that had chiefly come through customs levied on American imports. France in 1920 adopted the turnover tax, which in principle is similar to the sales tax, though more equitable in that in France it included services and transactions of all kinds, as well as commodities. Germany also has such a tax, which is very far-reaching in its effect.

"'WHO ASKED FOR IT?

"'Whatever may be said in favor of the sales tax, there is no doubt about it being an attempt to secure new revenue from the great mass of the people who work for a living. There is no pretension that it lightens the load of taxation resting on the masses; on the contrary, it is usually accompanied by measures designed to relieve the well-to-do of taxes borne by them. Canada's experience has demonstrated this in the most striking manner.

"'By whom has this tax been advocated? By the farmers, by labor, or by the great mass of those of small means? Influential financial, industrial, and commercial interests started the agitation. In March there was held at Toronto a conference on taxation attended by representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Credit Men's Association, the Retail Merchants' Association, and the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association. Neither the organized farmers nor labor were invited, though both would have sent representatives had their presence been desired. Note the recommendations made to the minister of finance by this gathering: 'That the business profits tax shall not be reenacted; that the income tax as regards corporations shall be repealed; that the present existing tax on confectionery shall be abolished; that the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide the additional revenue needed by the Dominion Government.'

"'It is true that in 1920, when the sales tax was first introduced, no taxes were abolished or reduced. But in 1921, when the tax was increased, it was made to do the bidding of the interests represented at the Toronto gathering, and no others. Everything asked, save the repeal of the income tax affecting corporations, was granted, and the nature of the sales tax was thus revealed in its true light. No attempt was made to secure from the best-off portions of the community any part of the revenue thus lost. The masses were expected to make up what the big business interests were relieved of. Sixty-two millions of new revenue were required, and in the heavier sales tax was the only means provided for the raising of the money, which meant a per capita tax of $7 for the year.

"'SOME ABSURD CLAIMS

"'Who are the advocates of the sales tax in the United States? For the most part they are representatives of the big interests, the agents of great capitalists and war profiteers, who, though they did not dare to complain of taxation while the war waged, have maintained a loud clamor against it since peace was proclaimed. These interests have conducted a vigorous propaganda in favor of the sales tax, many of the arguments thus advanced having been reproduced in Canada. Never before had as many absurd claims and extravagant statements been made on behalf of any system of taxation as have been made by the American advocates of the sales tax. They have told the public that a 1 percent tax would produce so much revenue that no income taxes below $5,000 and possibly $10,000 would be required; that all surtaxes on incomes might be abolished, and that practically all the special war taxes might be allowed to go. So absurd are their statements that they call in question the whole case for the sales tax, so that the general public may well regard it with suspicion. They have been prepared to promise anything in order to get the opportunity to shift the load from their own shoulders. If the Cdanaian Council of Agriculture had lived on this side of the border no better, clearer, or more significant statement could have been written regarding the absurd and misleading promises of United States sales-tax proponents. They desire to substitute a sales tax for the present income tax in this country, as set forth by witnesses in my remarks contained in the RECORD of January 3. Canada spoke her judgment at the recent election.

"'REVENUE RECEIPTS DISAPPOINTING

"'Again, I quote from the Canadian agricultural report:

"'The sales tax can never be regarded as one of the main sources of revenue in Canada, since to make it so could only be done through a violent disregard of the best recognized principles of taxation, namely, that taxes should be levied in proportion to the individual's ability to pay them. As a source of revenue the 1 percent tax in Canada was far from being a great success. During the 11 months up to the end of April 1921 that it was in operation it brought in only $40,898,383. As a producer of revenue it failed most when money was most needed. In October 1920, when business was good and retail prices still high, the collections were $5,020,476, but in April they fell to $2,873,219, and were still falling when the tax was increased. As Parliament voted $620,000,000 this year, one can easily see how far a 1 percent tax would go to produce that amount. During the 6 months that the luxury taxes were in operation they brought in $2,000,000 more than the sales tax did during the whole 11.

"'Advocates of the sales tax make much of the fact that it is easily collected, and they confidently assert that nobody feels it. A tax collected on the necessaries of life that all must have cannot fail to bring in a certain amount of money. But the question of the equitable nature of the tax must also be considered. Armies of occupation, through compulsion, sometimes succeed in raising large sums of money from comparatively poor countries; but to say that it can be collected is not sufficient justification for a tax. The sales tax is inequitable if for no other reason than that the poor man, who must spend practically all he earns, pays the tax out of what should go for necessaries, whereas the rich man pays it out of his surplus. The rich man, who spends several months in the year out of the country, escapes the tax; but the man who cannot afford to go away, pays.

"'LET THE CONSUMER BEWARE

"'The claim that the consumer did not feel the payment of the 1 percent tax is open to question. It is absurd to say that an already heavy taxed public does not feel the taking of another $40,000,000 from it, especially when the greater part of it is taken from the poorest paid. Surely, no one will contend that the new tax, which on domestic sales is at least 3 percent by the time it reaches the consumer * * * and the tax on imported commodities, which is 4 percent in such case * * * is not felt. It is difficult to determine definitely how much the cost to the consumer is increased by the sales tax, but the probability is that the 1921 rate will increase costs generally about 5 percent. On certain imported goods, on which the tax will never be less than 4 percent, the cost may be increased as much as 8 percent. This is especially true of commodities such as rubber tires, into the manufacture of which many imported materials enter. The effect of the tax in increasing the cost of lumber became so apparent that a reduction was made to the effect that the tax on sale of domestic material should not exceed 2 percent; on sales of imported lumber the rate was fixed at 3 percent. Even at these rates the tax is considerable to the settler who must build a house and outbuildings. It is, moreover, to be observed that the additional 1 percent on imports will have the effect of raising the home price on all such articles as are taxable. Experience with the tariff leads one to expect this.

"'The consumer is bound to feel the effects of the 1921 tax more than that of the preceding year for the further reason that the list of tax-free commodities has been much reduced. The following, which were exempt in 1920, are now taxed: Salted, smoked, and canned meats, soups, tea, coffee, condensed coffee, milk foods and similar milk products, sage, tapioca, macaroni, vermicelli, split peas, pea meal, rice, rice flour, cornstarch, potato starch and flour, canned and desiccated fruits and vegetables, maple, corn, and can sirup, and imitations thereof. No argument is required to show that the taxing of these articles is a very considerable additional levy on consumers. It is worthy of special note that tea and coffee, being imported articles, bear a tax of at least 4 percent. This is taxing the poor man's breakfast table, which most governments are now loath to do.

"'In the case of many persons enjoying but a small salary, or income, the sales tax practically cuts away the exemptions from the income tax. On an income of but $2,000 a year a married man pays no income tax; but calculating the per capita sales tax at $7, then if he has a family of four, he will pay $28. The head of a family of four—that is, a wife and two children—having a salary of $2,500 pays but $4 in income tax; but his sales tax will now take from him seven times that. And the examples to this effect could be multiplied.

"'AN INSIDIOUS TAX

"'One of the most dangerous features of the sales tax is its insidious character. So-called "painless" extraction methods of taxation are always to be feared, for, in a quiet way, they touch the average person most effectually. Definite knowledge of what taxes the individual pays is one of the surest safeguards against inequitable taxation. By the "painless" sales tax it is proposed to take this year $23,000,000 more from the consumers of Canada than was taken last year. What is the use of making a fight over the tariff if the money which it is hoped may thereby be saved is to be taken away by another method?

"'Additional danger lurks in the possibility that, having brought about its introduction, certain interests that have been benefited may further use it to shift other burdens from their shoulders. It is well known that they are restive under the tax on higher incomes, and also under the surtaxes, and it may be taken for granted that an attempt will be made to shift these onto the backs of the masses. The signs are not wanting that some of the most important political battles of the not distant future will be fought over the question of taxation.

"'There should be an insistence that taxes conform to the well-known canons of taxation laid down by Adam Smith in the following: "The subjects of every State ought to contribute toward the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue that they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the observance or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality, or inequality, of taxation." According to this standard, the sales tax is weighed in the balance and found wanting.

"'Winnipeg, August 1921.'

"In view of the foregoing statement founded on actual Canadian experience, will any man say the tax does not unjustly hit the poor man, and will anyone say it is not and was not a political issue that helped overthrow the conservative Canadian Parliament and reduce it to a hopeless minority?

"SUGAR

"Another statement in my letter quoted sugar at 10 cents per pound in Canada, while it is only 6 cents here. That statement has been challenged. I am glad to give my authority:

[From the Labor Gazette, Canada, Jan. 1922, pp. 92 to 99]

December prices for sugar

	Cents per pound
Nova Scotia	9.6
Ontario	9.3
Manitoba	9.7
Saskatchewan	10.1
Alberta	10.2
British Columbia	9.4
Moose Jaw	10.7

Average cost of living over 1913

[P. 90]

	Percent
Food	50
Fuel	87
Clothing	73
Sundries	81

"Remember that the purchasing power of the farmers' products in Canada, as in this country, makes a difference of more than double the prices here quoted to the farmers' disadvantage.

"Acting undoubtedly with the aid of advice, the President wrote Chairman Fordney regarding the soldiers' bonus bill. Suggestions from that high source are welcomed by every member of the party who has a legislative responsibility, however humble. In fact, I yield to no man in my appreciation of and high respect for the Executive; for the many difficulties he has met and surmounted as the party leader following an unprecedented industrial and economic war chaos and his world position rising far above rulers of all nations through the recent peace accomplishments of the Washington conference. I do not need to say more, and I speak from the standpoint of a lifelong Republican.

"The House has its constitutional duty to perform of providing revenues, and in its legislative work the added responsibility of securing agreement with the Senate. Following suggestions from the Secretary of the Treasury, the House Members sought to provide special taxes with which to finance the bonus bill, although in so doing a precedent would have been inaugurated that necessarily brings criticisms and protests against any tax and against any measure that requires a direct tax. It is not only an unprecedented method of legislation but manifestly unjust to the measure to be financed.

"The proposal invited committee disagreements and the President's letter containing suggestions followed. It suggested temporary delay if desirable in order to meet Treasury conditions, and to permit full cash payments to all service men and a general sales tax as a method of securing quick funds. Representatives of national ex-soldiers' organizations called before our committee referred to repeated promises for early action, objected to delay in the passage of the bill, and urged its speedy enactment as prepared with the five options. Asked specifically about full cash payments, they said that would prevent the acceptance of certificates or of issuance or home-building options in the bill that had been carefully prepared and long and seriously considered with a view to granting permanent aid in the majority of cases. If offered all cash in amounts of $500 or $600 as is construed from the letter instead of continuing payments, the temptation would be offered all men to take cash and ignore other provisions.

"The sentiment of agriculture and labor in this country on the subject of a sales tax based on recent expressions is as follows:

"'STATEMENT OF SAMUEL GOMPERS, FEBRUARY 16, 1922

"'Organized labor stands 100 percent for the soldiers' bonus, but is opposed to a sales tax as a means of raising revenue for the bonus, just as it is opposed to a sales tax to pay any debt contracted by the Government.

"'The attempt to attach the worthy proposal for the bonus to a most vicious measure inimical to the rights and interests of our citizenship is a flagrant manner of incurring the people's resentment to a just cause.

"'Labor recognizes in the proposal to attach the sales tax to the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill a subterfuge intended either to defeat the bonus or to create a feeling of resentment against the veterans of the World War by placing the burden upon those least able to bear it, and by permitting the escape of those who profiteered so relentlessly during the period of the war and since the war.

"'The bonus should have the approval of Congress, but to create a sales tax would be to turn a measure of justice into an imposition and an injustice upon the whole people.

"'The position of labor upon the sales tax is stated officially in the following resolution:

"'"Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled declares against the imposition of a retail or general sales tax or turnover tax, or any other tax on consumption, and opposes the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and demands that the highest rate of taxation levied during the war upon incomes and excess profits be retained until the full money cost of the war has been paid."

"'Congress refused to adopt the sales tax as a part of the general revenue provisions. That proposal should not now be used to becloud the merits of a measure intended to do justice to those who patriotically defended the country in its hour of need.'

"'Many other recent statements from labor have been quoted in previous remarks, but I will only repeat extracts from one that is concise and indicates the way a sales tax is regarded by American consumers generally:

"[Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen]

"CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 14, 1922.

"To All Members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in the United States:

"DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: The attention of all members is called to the proposed sales tax bill introduced by Congressman Volk, of New York. It is the intention to raise $2,000,000,000 a year by a sales tax upon everything you consume. In order to have this bill put over and become a law, they have tied it up as a part of the bill for a bonus for soldiers. We think all workingmen agree that the soldiers who fought for their country are entitled to a bonus, and that such a bill should be passed, but, in our opinion, it is not necessary, in order to pay this bonus, that the working people of the United States should be taxed through a direct sales tax bill to the amount of $2,000,000,000.

"The sales tax bill can be killed most easily by the enactment of a rapidly progressive tax upon estates, by restoring the excess-profits tax, by retaining heavy taxation of large incomes, by levying a small tax on the value of land in excess of $10,000, with an exemption to all farmers who receive less than $3,000 income per year, as provided in the Keller bill. Senator LA FOLLETTE has introduced such an estate tax bill (S. 2901), and it has been referred to the Senate Committee on Finance.

"Hoping you will give this your prompt consideration, we remain,

"AMERICAN FARMERS

"The American Farm Bureau as late as February 17 of this week—yesterday—issued a letter to Members of Congress on a sales tax, which I am advised was passed upon by President Howard and other responsible officers. It is as follows:

"AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
"Washington, D.C., February 17, 1922.

"DEAR SIRS: The American Farm Bureau Federation is against the sales or manufacturers' tax for raising the soldier bonus as suggested by the President. We feel it is just as uneconomic to place a sales tax upon the people for the purpose of giving a bonus to the soldiers as it is for raising revenue for general Government expenses. The sales tax is levied upon food, clothing, and the necessities of life of the average man and does not take the money from those who are most able to pay.

"Taxes are already exceedingly high and a sales tax would only mean further burden upon the average individual, and when we stop to consider that the average income of each man, woman, and child in this country whose income is below the income-tax level is only $333 per year, the American Farm Bureau Federation believes it would be a rank injustice to raise further revenue for the soldier bonus by this method. It would take away from these people any prospect of accumulating a competence no matter how small, and would blight their hope of bettering conditions. Not only would it cut off their opportunity for saving but in countless instances it would mean less food, fewer shoes and stockings, less coal for the stoves, and more crowded living quarters. It must be remembered that the bulk of the revenue, if secured by a sales tax, will be derived from the taxes on food, fuel, clothing, and shelter.

"We feel that the passage of the sales tax would cause many farmers so to shape their farming operations as to be more nearly self-sustaining, and therefore still further reduce business operations of our country. The farmer now gets only 37 cents of the consumers' dollar and a sales tax will reduce that amount. We are glad, however, that Congress has seen fit to discard the proposed sales tax once, and the federation sincerely hopes that it will do so again.

"Very truly yours,

"AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
"GRAY SILVER, Washington Representative."

"I cannot make this any plainer than by quoting a short letter recently received from representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation. In these letters they assume to speak for an agricultural organization numbering between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 active members. They denounce all consumption taxes that in like manner are denounced by Canadian labor and agricultural interests, speaking from the standpoint of the consumer.

"I quote:

"AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
"Chicago, Ill., December 27, 1921.

"Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
"House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

"Replying to your letter of December 23. The American Farm Bureau Federation is unalterably opposed to any general sales or turnover tax, a manufacturers' tax, or any means of shifting the bulk of the taxes from income to consumption taxes.

"The more the matter is agitated and the better the people come to understand what is involved the more determined they become in their opposition, and this policy, if persisted in, will surely bring calamity to its advocates.

"It takes from the farmer, the laborer, and all those below the income-tax level a part of their living, and the bulk of the tax would necessarily come out of the necessaries of life—food, fuel, shelter, and clothing.

"It is an effort to shift to the 90,000,000 people below the income-tax level the burden of the war taxes; it would absorb a considerable part of what buying power they now have, and thus sink us still deeper in the slough from which we are trying to extricate ourselves.

"It would stir up such a social ferment as we have never had in this country, and is both socially unjust and economically unsound.

"It is opposed by all the agricultural interests of the country as well as by organized labor. Political madness lies that way.

"Yours, truly,

"H. C. MCKENZIE,
"Tax Representative."

"The following letter from President Howard is equally positive in statement:

"AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
"Chicago, Ill., December 28, 1921.

"Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
"Committee on Ways and Means,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

"DEAR MR. FREAR: * * * We believe that taxes should be levied according to the measure or ability of the individual to meet them, and are particularly opposed to the so-called "sales tax or turnover tax." Its enactment would place an undue burden upon the farmers of the country, due to the fact that their income both on labor and invested capital is, and always has been, below that of any other class of our people, while at the same time we are of necessity very large consumers not only of food and clothing but of steel and iron products, building materials, etc. The sales tax would add to the costs of all these things, which burden would be strenuously opposed by all farmers. Not only that, such a tax would react on industry by further curtailing the farmers' purchases, and industry is already suffering from that very cause. * * *

"Very truly yours,

"AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
"J. R. HOWARD, President."

"Yesterday, February 16, the National Grange, composed of over 1,000,000 members, gave out the following statement:

"'GRANGE PROTESTS SALES TAX

"'The National Grange, through its Washington representative, T. C. Atkeson, in letters sent today to Senator McCumber, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Representative Fordney, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, declared it is "unalterably opposed to the sales tax or any form of direct consumption tax for the soldier bonus or for any other purposes."

"'"The sales tax is a deliberate effort to shift tax burdens from those best able to pay to those least able to pay", the letters said. "Once a sales tax is inaugurated, backed with the power which is now urging it, it is doubtful if it could ever be set aside, and we can look forward to steadily diminishing taxes on large incomes and inheritances and to steadily increasing sales taxes to pay the burden of government."

"'"The National Grange", Mr. Atkeson continued, "has suggested an excess-profits tax to pay the soldier bonus. Should that be inexpedient, the tax decided on should be so levied that it will not be levied to the direct cost of necessities of the great number of people of limited income."'"

"The national farm meeting called by President Harding recently, in Washington, passed the following resolution against any sales tax. I quote from editorial that shows the protest against a sales tax:

"[From editorial page of Farm and Home for March, Chicago, Ill., and Springfield, Mass.]

"'THE SALES TAX—UPON THE NECESSARIES OF LIFE—THE POOR SHALL PAY THE TAX—THE RICH MAY LARGELY ESCAPE THIS TAX

"'We positively and earnestly protest against any consumption or sales or manufacturers' tax, or any other tax which shifts the burden onto those lease able to pay, onto the necessaries of life, and has proved disappointing financially and unjust socially wherever tried. Unanimously adopted by national agricultural conference at Washington, January 27, representing all phases of farmers' thought and farm activity.

"'This tax is now urged on Congress—a tax on sales—within 3 weeks of the day that the farmers' conference at Washington unanimously protested against such a tax. The common people, the masses, unitedly oppose it.

"'If this tax is imposed, it means that you will have to pay an extra tax of probably 3 cents on every dollar you spend. Of course, the retail prices that you pay will be correspondingly increased. Worse yet, the wholesale price that you get for your produce when sold will be correspondingly decreased.

"'Thus you, the farmer, the producer, the worker—all persons of moderate means—may be forced to pay the equivalent of not 3 cents, but somewhere between 5 and 10 cents extra upon every dollar you spend, while having as much more deducted from every dollar's worth of stuff you produce and sell.

"'WEALTH ESCAPES TAX

"'Did you notice how theaters, financiers, and other special interests protested in unison against the righteous plan of taxing amusements, speculation, excess profits, and great wealth? Those powerful interests are so highly organized that they made their protest effective within 24 hours.

"'The logical result is now the proposed sales tax. It will be but trifling upon those best able to pay, while a well night insufferable burden upon everyone least able to stand additional taxes.'"

"The National Board of Farm Organizations is equally opposed to the sales tax, and its secretary, Mr. Lyman, sends a letter which also contains cumulative testimony from the secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture against a sales tax. I quote:

"NATIONAL BOARD OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS,
"Washington, D.C., January 24, 1922.

"Congressman JAMES A. FREAR,
"House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

"DEAR MR. FREAR: I have gotten in touch with Canadian people in regard to the sales tax, and I hope to have a definite reply soon.

"In the January 14 issue of the Prairie Farmer, published in Chicago, a copy of a letter from N. P. Lambert, secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, appears as follows:

"Our organization throughout the whole country is strongly opposed to the sales tax. The principle of this tax is wrong in our opinion, being based on the consuming capacity of the great masses rather than their ability to pay. The sales tax was in vogue in the Middle Ages, in such countries as Spain, but today I believe the only countries that have used it to any extent are Mexico, Germany, Philippine Islands, and, I think, France. It is generally regarded as a confession on the part of any country that adopts it that all other sources of revenues have been exhausted."

"This appears to throw an entirely different light on the matter as far as the Canadian farmers are concerned and is also in line with my previous understanding of the real position taken by the farmers in that country.

"Sincerely yours,

"CHAS. A. LYMAN, Secretary."

"From recent committee hearings another farmers' organization representative is quoted:

"[Hearing, Jan. 20, 1922, p. 35. Benjamin Marsh, Farmers' National Council]

"'Mr. MARSH. Gentlemen, I wish some of you had taken the trips which I have and talked with these farmers and workers—some workers who have been out of a job for 6 or 8 months and every last dollar gone, and the farmers, who are broke, absolutely—and when you talk about a sales tax—I want to tell you that the sales tax is the dead line politically for any party, and deservedly so.

"'Mr. FREAR. Mr. Leffingwell agreed in his opposition to a sales tax and so did Dr. Seligman when they were before our committee.

"'Mr. MARSH. And so do something like 20,000,000 voters. They would be interested vitally.'

"And from scores of witnesses named in RECORDS of January 3 and January 27 I quote two men of acknowledged standing and fairness who recently appeared before our committee:

"'Mr. SELIGMAN. It is true, I assume, that the general principles governing democratic taxation in this country would continue and that no democratic country would intend to pass or for a moment consider a tax on consumption, because it is only in time of war that there is any need for the restriction of consumption, whereas in time of peace you want to increase consumption that you can increase production and industry and prosperity.'"

"[Hearing, Jan. 19, 1922, p. 22. R. C. Leffingwell]

"'Mr. LEFFINGWELL. The economic and social objection to a sales tax or to any indirect tax is that it hits the man who has to consume the things that his income will buy, because his income is so small and his family so big—out of all proportion to his income—so that the tax is much heavier on him than it is on the man who has a great big income and has to spend a very negligible proportion to meet his tax.

"'I believe that the sound principles of taxation are going to come to be recognized by all parties, because they go to the root of social content; and whether we are Republicans or Democrats, and whatever our school of economics and whatever our historical thought about questions like the tariff, whatever our instincts about a sales tax, it is coming down to this, that you cannot afford to put the inordinate burdens of the modern state upon the shoulders of the consumer, who has to spend all of his income to keep alive.'

"Not one witness favoring a sales tax appeared before the Ways and Means Committee. In fact, this tax seemed friendless until it was suddenly proposed as a means of financing the bonus bill. No chance to examine witnesses has been afforded the committee to expose the character of the tax.

"SALES TAX VERSUS EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

"A comparison of those opposed to a sales tax and advocating the reenactment of an excess-profits tax is not complete without presenting another picture that comes from the lips of a man whose wonderful power of analysis is rarely equaled in or out of Congress. I quote from a soldiers' journal, March 1922, called Treat 'Em Square. It gives the ex-soldiers' viewpoint, and on page 29 contains the following from a public speech of a distinguished United States Senator:

"'Why should not the very wealthy seek to escape? Mr. President, they have been seeking to escape and have been making a great battle along that line.

"'WEALTH ESCAPES BURDEN

"'Along last winter I happened to be in the city of New York. A friend of mine extended me an invitation to go with him down to the Economic Club. As I always have been obliged to practice economy, I thought I would learn something that would enable me to continue the habit of my life; but when I reached this assemblage, a very costly banquet—I make no point of that, because my friend paid for the ticket—I think I can say that there were several billions of dollars represented around those tables, and a speech was made in favor of a sales tax, and the leading speech was made by a broker who is said to be the largest broker in the world, and to have transactions in a single day which frequently equal $50,000,000. He is not at all a bad citizen. He is a good broker. That is the best and the worst you can say of him.

"'But, viewing the question from his standpoint, it was but natural that he should think in the terms of his clients' interests, and his clients were the great institutions engaged in floating vast blocks of stocks and of bonds; and as they filtered through his office of course they paid some tribute on their way to the ultimate consumer, the customer who buys these securities. When he told that multitude of a plan that would distribute the taxes everywhere so that everybody would have to pay, so that there would be no escape, and that the taxes would not be paid by the great institutions of the country but would be borne by the entire mass of the people, the champagne glasses were put upon the table and highballs sat unconsumed while the assembled enthusiasts cheered the sentiment to the echo.

"'SHIFT BURDEN TO POOR

"'Of course, he said, the tax was passed on, like all taxes; therefore it might as well be paid by the common people at the beginning as at the end, in one way as in another; and then he told us in the next breath, as we have been told on this floor, that the burden upon business is so great that business cannot prosper; that is to say, they tell you in one breath that business does not have to pay the tax at all, and in the next breath they tell you that it is so oppressive that business cannot live if you exact it. Now, you cannot have both ends of that argument. If the tax is passed on it hurts nobody; particularly it does not hurt the man who first pays it and passes it on. If the tax is not passed on, then the other argument fails and it becomes apparent that the common people of the land who have but little pay only a little, while those who have much must pay in proportion to their wealth.

"'That was the initial movement; it was, if you please, the kick-off in the great game that was proposed to be played which had for its purpose the removal of excess-profits taxes, surtaxes, and corporate taxes.

"'Senators may vote to table this amendment [on excess profits] when it comes up, but I repeat, every man who votes to table it will vote against it * * * will cast a vote in a way to save himself from a direct vote; but if he does it he will vote to kill the soldiers' bonus, and at the same time he will vote to take off the excess-profits taxes, and that would be worse than to vote directly on the proposition.'

"I have quoted from a soldiers' magazine that in turn quotes from the official CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the debate in the Senate. Whatever we may think of the general sales tax or the excess-profits tax, is it not time to pause and reflect on the Canadian record and the political situation we are inviting in this country by adding a sales tax to the soldiers' bonus bill?

"THE ANTI-SALES-TAX VOTE

"This sales tax was rejected by Congress when the revenue bill was passed a few months ago and received slight consideration then because it has always been a disappointment in estimates and in equity. In France revenues per month fell to 43 percent of estimates within less than a year and fell in Canada to 57 percent of estimates according to report. The tax is a tax on the living wage and the poorest man who walks the streets out of work and the rich man find a common level for the first time financially in this consumption tax. Politically they also stand on the level. I have quoted from farm organizations representing in membership between three and four million adults, which membership is against a sales tax, if the representatives speak for the membership. I have quoted from the highest officials of organized labor and of the railways representing a combined membership of several million adults, all of whom have reason to oppose a sales tax on the living wage. From seven to ten million adults and their families reaching one half of the total vote conservatively may be estimated to be the combined farm and labor vote opposed to a sales tax or a tax on consumption, if that vote is cast as it was in Canada.

"When wealth is anxious to shift its income tax over to the consumer, even as it has shifted $500,000,000 taxes this year, it is well to ascertain what interest organizations now urging a sales tax have in the matter. These questions were discussed in the RECORD of January 3. If it be a fact that farming and labor interests have a combined adult population of 10,000,000 people or more at a modest estimate, their influence may be measured if they feel the consumption tax is now being aimed at them to relieve wealth from its fair share of taxation.

"At a late moment I insert a letter written to every Member of the House by a number of Members that gives further reasons for opposing any sales-tax provision to the bonus bill.

"THE SALES TAX IS FUNDAMENTALLY WRONG

"The letter is as follows:

"'DEAR COLLEAGUE: We, the undersigned, who favor the soldiers' bonus bill, urge you not to consent to any manufacturers' or other sales tax as a means of raising revenues for meeting this obligation. We believe the economies effected by this Congress in the ordinary governmental expenses, together with the very substantial reductions to be made in the appropriations for the Army and Navy as a result of the disarmament conference, will very nearly provide the money with which to meet the cash payments as contemplated under the provisions of H.R. 1. It is estimated that something more than $100,000,000 in addition to the above savings will be needed annually for the next 2 years to meet the bonus, after which the revenues will be ample to meet all demands.

"'This $100,000,000 annually, or $200,000,000, if need be, can easily and readily be raised by the issuance of short-term certificates. You will recall that the Treasury Department a short time ago placed upon the market short-term certificates in the amount of $400,000,000, and the records disclose the subscriptions for this issue were approximately $1,200,000,000, or three times the amount of the issue. Neither during the time these certificates were being sold nor since has there been the slightest indication of an adverse effect upon the money market, but instead it is since then the country has witnessed the greatest strides toward the return of normalcy. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency indicates a constantly increasing improvement in our financial affairs. Consequently we believe there is undue alarm as to the possible effects of an issue of short-term certificates in order to meet the demands of the bonus.

"'The President believes the ex-soldier should be paid the cash bonus all at once and that it should not be spread over a number of payments. This would require an expenditure of $1,500,000,000 within the next two years. He suggests a general sales tax as a means of raising this sum. Clearly, if this amount of money is to be raised by this means in one year or two, the tax must be applied to everything, including the actual necessities of life.

"'Just how this tax works out in fact is best exemplified by the Canadian sales tax as applied to sugar. In Canada sugar is produced under almost exactly the same conditions as in the United States. They produce beet sugar in large quantities, and cane sugar is imported from the Tropics and refined. The expense of these operations is on a standard with similar operations here. In January sugar was retailing at 10 cents per pound in Canada and 6 cents in the United States. The tax there is a semi 1½-percent turn-over. The manufacturer or importer is taxed 1½ percent and the jobber 1½ percent—in all, 3 percent. Three percent on 6 cents—the price of sugar where the sales tax does not apply—is 1.8 mills, and if the amount of the tax only was collected from the consumer, the Canadian would be paying $0.0618 per pound for his sugar instead of 10 cents. When the merchant sells 100 pounds of sugar and collects the tax thereon, he collects 18 cents for the treasury and $3.82 for himself, the jobber, and the wholesaler, or more than twenty-one times the amount of the tax. And yet certain people proclaim this a "painless" tax.

"'Ninety millions of our people, whose income is below the income-tax level, have an average annual income of less than $350. These 90,000,000 will pay 85 percent of the revenue derived from a sales tax in addition to the billions which will go to the manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers as a result of such tax. Millions are out of employment, and the farmers of the country are in dire straits. To add to their burdens would be a calamity.

"'Wall Street is openly in favor of a sales tax, according to an afternoon paper. It is known that back of the propaganda with which the country has been flooded during the past 2 years are the strong manufacturers' organizations. If this tax was to be absorbed by the members of these organizations, would they be advocating it? We think not. We believe they recognize fully that a sales tax is an ideal method of further increasing profits.

"'We wish also to call your attention to the fact that if a sales tax is placed upon the statute books for the purpose of raising funds for the bonus, it is going to be but 2 years until the revenues raised in this manner can be no longer used for this purpose. The bonus will then have been paid. We believe that when this time comes it will be most difficult to repeal such a law, for the reason that every special and favored interest in the country will demand its retention, and also insist that the tax on wealth be further reduced. When this is accomplished the process of the shifting of the burden of taxation will be complete.

"'We believe the sales tax to be fundamentally wrong and that it will never be countenanced by the American people.

"'If the Ways and Means Committee should report out a bill carrying this tax feature, and a special rule which in any way abrogates the right of any Member to offer amendments to the tax provision should be presented to the House, we earnestly ask that you vote against such a rule. If there is to be a tax provision in the bill, it is extremely important that there should be a full and free discussion as to what this provision shall do.

"'Respectfully yours,

"'Horace M. Towner, C. Frank Reavis, M. E. Rhodes, Florian Lampert, Oscar E. Keller, Edward E. Browne, John M. Nelson, A. P. Nelson, M. Clyde Kelly, Henry E. Barbour, Joseph D. Beck, Royal C. Johnson, L. J. Dickinson, John I. Nolan, Edward Voigt, Roy O. Woodruff, Louis C. Cramton, Phil D. Swing, W. Frank James, James A. Frear, John C. Ketcham, L. M. Gensman, Robert E. Evans.'"

In view of the fact that this bill may be squeezed through the House notwithstanding its peculiar character and later meet with the fate it deserves in the Senate, I am submitting further testimony for the use of the latter body in case the eminent authorities at the other end of the Capitol should desire any arguments beyond good judgment that would seem to reject any sales tax now or at any other time when it is recognized that it violates every principle of taxing those according to their ability to pay and is based upon the necessities of the taxpayer placing the poorest consumer in the proud position of an equal taxpayer with Rockefeller who lives on Shredded Wheat and the simplest food.

I now quote from a speech of January 31, 1921, found in the RECORD of that date, and if by chance a portion of the testimony I have given should be repeated it will be unintentional but may serve to further remind us of facts which may have been forgotten.

A portion of the discussion is given to a turn-over sales tax, as well as the manufacturer's sales tax now before us, but the principle is the same, although the manufacturers', with smaller pyramiding, does not present all the difficulties and injustices of a turn-over tax.

"A WAR SALES TAX DURING PEACE

"Propaganda for the passage of a consumption sales tax by Congress is vigorously being waged. The stakes are $800,000,000 now paid from corporation excess profits that would then be shifted to the backs of 100,000,000 people, who must consume in order to live. Should this tax be shifted?

"Mr. FREAR. I desire to express the embarrassment of trying to discuss a question that ordinarily would take an hour and a half or 2 hours in the time allotted to me, which must be apparent to every Member of the House. We have a peculiar legislative situation in the House, that men can get recognition to speak only on general supply bills except by unanimous consent. When the supply bill is under discussion objection is often made that we cannot speak at that time on matters that are of the most vital importance to the Government but must confine our remarks to the bill. Think of the absurdity of this position of an intelligent body of men acting here on behalf of their constituents and for the country under such circumstances. [Applause.]

"Mr. Chairman, the proposition that I desire to discuss is one which proposes to repeal the present tax involving $800,000,000 under the excess-profits tax, and imposing in lieu thereof a tax of $1,000,000,000 by what is known as a sales tax known as 'the turnover sales tax.' Every man in this House should be informed on that subject before he votes, and there is no way under heaven in which you can learn the facts except by someone digging into them and ascertaining what laws are in effect in other countries, and whether those laws have been effective or not.

"I will say this briefly, that there have been several men here before the Ways and Means Committee—intelligent men, very able men—advocating the enactment of a general turnover sales tax, which, as you know, is imposed in Germany and in the Philippine Islands and in Mexico, the only three countries that impose it effectually. There they tax the sugar and tea and everything that they eat and drink on every turn-over that may be had. The ablest body of men that has met in this country to consider this subject, known as 'the National Industrial Tax Board', have brought in a report showing how entirely objectionable that system would be for this country. The United States Chamber of Commerce, through its tax board, acting intelligently and weighing all the arguments, has brought in practically a similar report, which I will incorporate in my remarks.

"Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell how many turn-overs there are?

"Mr. FREAR. I will. There are practically 9 turn-overs in the case of cotton goods and woolen goods, 8 turn-overs in the case of leather goods, and 7 or 8 in the case of steel; that is, from the original ore up to the time of the finished article. What applies to these articles applies with equal force to almost everything we use. In other words, this proposed tax of 1 cent on each turnover has to be applied from 5, 6, and 7 to 9 times.

"But that is not the worst. You will find that in many cases where the present tax on luxuries is imposed they have raised the price of the goods sometimes 400 percent during the different turn-overs.

"Mr. Chairman, our Government is facing an annual tax burden five times the size of its pre-war expenditures. During the recent war large receipts were had from excess-profits taxes on corporations and on personal income taxes due largely to the surtax. Congress now is facing a well-organized propaganda, based on assumed economic arguments, for the repeal of the excess-profits tax and for a reduction on income surtaxes. Another extensive, well-organized propaganda exists which demands the passage of a turnover consumption tax law, with a sweeping tax on all necessaries of life, which bill is pressed for passage by Otto Kahn, Julius Bache, Myer Rothschild, and others who have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee urging a turnover sales tax. Practically no opposition arguments have been presented to the committee.

"Only limited study has been or can be given this vastly important subject by the average Representative in Congress, and I am not assuming to speak against a sales tax from the standpoint of a tax student or tax authority, but from the viewpoint of a layman and legislator whose responsibilities are equally due to the banker, broker, and bricklayer, the capitalist and cobbler, the financier and farmer, the manufacturer and machinist, the teacher and day laborer, all of whom to a greater or less degree will help pay the $5,000,000,000 annual tax hereafter to be collected.

"I desire to place before you the views of recognized tax students and authorities and shall intrude my own observations only briefly and for the purpose of calling attention to matters that have seemed to me worthy of consideration; but first as to the problems before us.

"Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman.

"Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Does the gentleman discuss also the final sales tax?

"Mr. FREAR. I will say that the final sales tax has not been pressed upon the attention of the Ways and Means Committee, for the reason that it brings in such a small income comparatively. We have what is called a final sales tax, of course, with the luxury tax today, but it is only a small producer of revenue. We need to raise a billion dollars or thereabouts by taxation to meet not only the repeal of the excess-profits tax, if we repeal that tax, but also to lower the surtaxes on personal incomes. That has been urged strongly, and it is something that may really have to be brought about, because today those who are paying high surtaxes are investing in tax-exempt securities.

"Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If you raised the same amount of money by a final sales tax, would not the final sales tax be just as objectionable?

"Mr. FREAR. Yes. They pyramid each time there is a sale made, and it reaches an enormous amount of money.

"Mr. MCCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the question.

"The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

"Mr. FREAR. Of course, any Member can block the wheels in this House unless we pass a resolution to stop it. This is a most important proposition affecting the river and harbor bill. It deals with the raising of funds to provide for the rivers and harbors, to provide for the railroads to function, and to run every Department of Government, a question which every one of us is interested in, and the gentleman ought to know that it is directly in point, and not subject to his point of order.

"CONSUMPTION SALES TAX AND SOLDIERS' BONUS BILL

"Mr. Chairman, constant assaults on the excess profits tax law from all directions indicate it is a friendless waif, not popular with those whose profits it has heretofore divided for the support of Government and it also seems probable, judging from opposition expressed against any new form of tax, that no substitute will meet with general approval. One tax is insistently urged upon Congress in case the excess profits tax law is repealed. It is known as a 'consumption turnover sales tax' and was vigorously pressed on the Ways and Means Committee last session in an effort to make it part of the revenue plan that was to provide for financing the soldiers' bonus bill, which bill finally passed the House.

"At that time, after a short but sharp contest, a Republican caucus rejected a sales-tax plan which in effect proposed to compel ex-service men to contribute through such tax to their own use. The measure was rejected as stated and other means of raising revenues were then adopted. The head of the same consumption sales-tax plan has again been raised and it is now financed by large interests that seek to escape their full share of taxation. Ex-service men and women and every other man and woman in the country are to be called upon to contribute to this sales tax, although no return is now offered them directly or indirectly.

"WHAT IS A TURNOVER CONSUMPTION TAX?

"It is a reminder of the small boy's description of a toothache, 'an abomination in the eyes of the Lord that does no man good.'

However, a consumption turnover tax will do everybody—good and plenty. It is a tax levied on every pound of sugar, salt, and starch that goes into family use from the growing of the sugar beets to its purchase at the store, on every pound of flour and other food, on every pound of meat from the farm to the packer and back again, on every pound of tea or coal, on every garment from the hat down to shoes and stockings, or, like an old-time description of a tariff bill, it is a tax from the cradle to the coffin. Every sale of wood from the owner to the logger, to the millman, to the cradle or coffin factory, to the wholesaler, to the retailer, and finally to the customer who pays the tax on every turn-over with several times added for good measure, until the actual cost and actual tax join in a free-for-all price raising for the 105,000,000 consumers who will pay an equal share of the increase. The wealthiest and poorest will pay the same tax, because a turnover sales tax plays no favorites from Vanderbilt to the humblest beggar when both must eat or starve.

"During 1918, 1 person in this country paid on an annual income of over $5,000,000, 2 on between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, 11 on between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, 49 on between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000, and 179 others on incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000. Under a turnover tax these people would turn over the same amount of tax for the same food, drink, and wear as the poorest in the land. Fraud in omitting to report sales, which will be general, would penalize only the consumer. Administration by the Government would become a hopeless task, judging from past experience, when every seller levies the tax with a generous margin on the goods sold, whether the tax is reported or not. It is neither a just, equitable, nor enforceable tax, and I desire to present proof of these charges against the criminal at the bar—a turnover-consumption tax.

"Let me place before you the best thought of the country that unqualifiedly condemns and convicts a sales tax and present some facts which are not based on theories but come from men whose judgment we may well respect.

"First. I will give the conclusions of the leading economic-tax investigation that has taken place since the war. The body making this report is not composed of farmers, laboring men, or others who would unanimously condemn a sales tax if given opportunity to do so. The National Industrial Conference Board is composed of 25 affiliated industrial organizations representing cotton, woolen, metal, boot and shoe, pig iron, and others that have a capital invested of several billions of dollars, in the aggregate, and employ several million men. No organization can speak with more force from the standpoint of national industry or aided by better expert advice. Other high authorities will be found to sustain the industrial board's findings.

"Second. The arguments and influences now urging a consumption-turnover tax will be presented.

"Third. Testimony of individual tax experts opposed to a sales tax will be offered—men whose judgment is of great value in solving the greatest tax problem that ever confronted this Government in time of peace.

"REPORT OF TAX COMMITTEE, NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL BOARD

"Mr. Chairman, I quote first from a report of the tax committee of the National Industrial Conference Board on the Federal tax problem, December 1920. The report says:

"'Various advocates of a general turnover tax estimate that a 1-percent tax on all turnovers would produce from $1,500,000,000 to $5,000,000,000. If the tax is limited to 1 percent on the turnover of goods, wares, and merchandise alone, the estimates go down as low as $750,000,000. * * * It has been suggested that bankers, brokers, and commission men should be taxed not on their sales but on their commissions or gross profits.'

"If a 1-percent turnover tax were imposed upon each step in the cotton, leather, and steel business, it would carry separate tax on each of the following turnovers, according to the report:

"'Cotton

"'1. Raw cotton to gin.
"'2. Gin to spinner.
"'3. Spinner to mercerizer.
"'4. Mercerizer to dyer.
"'5. Dyer to weaver.
"'6. Weaver to finisher.
"'7. Finished cloth to wholesaler.
"'8. Wholesaler to retailer.
"'9. Retailer to customer.

"'Leather

"'1. Farmer to cattle buyer.
"'2. Buyer to hide dealer.
"'3. Hides to tanner.
"'4. Tanner to leather merchant.
"'5. Leather merchant to shoe manufacturer.
"'6. Shoe manufacturer to jobber.
"'7. Jobber to retailer.
"'8. Retailer to customer.

"'Steel

"'1. Iron ore to smelter.
"'2. Smelter to manufacturer of ingots.
"'3. Manufacturer of ingots to manufacturer at rolling mill.
"'4. Steel manufacturer to tool manufacturer.
"'5. Tool manufacturer to wholesaler.
"'6. Wholesaler to retailer.
"'7. Retailer to customer.'

"These steps may be enlarged and the 1-percent tax on each tax may be doubled and quadrupled, as illustrations later quoted will disclose.

"THE TURNOVER SALES TAX

"[From report of tax committee of the National Industrial Conference Board]

"'1. The advocates of such a tax claim that it will in nearly every instance be shifted. If so, the tax could not be defended upon the grounds of social justice, because it would then fall with a force unequal to their ability to pay upon those least able to bear the burden. It would, in fact, be "a tax against the living wage."

"'2. It is claimed by the proponents of such a tax that not only will it generally be shifted but that the exact amount of the tax would be passed on to the consumer. What ground is there for the assertion that a turnover tax imposed on each of many transactions all the way to the raw material will not be loaded just as often as a specific tax of a fixed and known amount? If $1,500,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 should be collected from a sales tax levied on each turnover, would not this amount be loaded heavily?

"'3. From the business point of view the uncertainty as to whether the (sales) tax would be shifted is most serious. The committee cannot accept as conclusive the assertion that this tax would be passed on or that in the cases in which it was not passed on the tax is so small that the effect would be slight. A 1-percent tax on sales would in many cases be more than a tax of 30 percent or even 50 percent of net income. If any great proportion of the billion or more dollars which is to be raised by such a tax would have to be paid by business which could not pass it on, the result would be wide-spread ruin and disaster.

"'4. Whether or not the tax could be shifted, it would tend to encourage changes in business practices which are not in accordance with the economic development of the country. Many classes of so-called "middlemen" who perform a service which is well worth what it costs would be driven out of business. Devices to get around the tax through the avoidance of technical sales would be multiplied.

"'5. In cases where it is not shifted in its entirety a tax imposed upon all sales or upon the turnover of a business becomes to that extent a tax on gross income.

"'The inequity of a tax turnover on gross income as between a business which turns its capital once in several years and another which turns its capital several times a year, provided the tax cannot be shifted, is too great to be borne.

"'6. The advantage which a business enterprise carrying on several consecutive processes in the manufacture or distribution of a commodity would have over other enterprises which were not so self-contained, due to the pyramiding effect of a sales tax at each turnover, is little realized until concrete cases are examined and compared, as has been done by the committee.'

"After illustrating seven turnover taxes from iron ore to the finished steel tool, the committee's conclusion is reached: 'In cases in which the taxes could not be shifted a pyramided tax might often prove ruinous.'

"'7. No dependable calculations have been submitted by its proponents as to the amount of revenue which such a tax would produce. Estimates by different parties range from $5,000,000,000 down to $1,500,000,000 for a 1-percent tax on all turnovers and down to $750,000,000 for a 1-percent tax on the turnover of goods, wares, and merchandise alone. It is suggested that bankers and brokers should be taxed, not on their sales but on their commissions or gross profits. If this is so, why should a wholesaler whose gross profit on each individual sale may not be larger than the banker's pay a tax on his entire sales? (Who suggested?)

"'8. The administrative difficulties involved in a turnover sales tax are but little appreciated by those who have not had close practical experience with the administration of a tax national in its scope. The administration of such a tax would raise serious problems, and the number of taxpayers would be so greatly increased that it would probably be difficult to prevent wholesale evasions.

"'9. It would be economically unsound.

"'10. While the committee has not allowed political expediency to influence its conclusions, political opposition to a sales tax must be given serious consideration.'

"The foregoing are brief extracts from findings of a committee of experts representing the greatest industrial organization in the country. It is notable that eight reasons are given why a sales tax would injure or destroy different manufacturing interests and two reasons are given as to its unsoundness economically and politically.

"REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TAXATION, OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES

"It would seem that no careful legislator will be deluded by the arguments of a handful of financially interested advocates of a turnover sales tax, and the objections already presented are unanswerable; but another organization, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, has aimed to give the same service to Congress on the same vitally important tax problem, and through its committee of nine tax authorities has also announced its findings on a turnover sales tax. The report of its committee against this tax is unanimous. I quote at some length because of the recognized high standing of this country-wide commercial organization:

"A CONSUMPTION TAX—DIFFICULTY OF ADMINISTRATION

"'Various arguments have been brought forward in support of a sales tax, but in the opinion of the committee these arguments are overcome by important objections to any attempt to use such a source for Federal revenues. In the first place, the application of any of these taxes and its successful administration would not be so simple as is often supposed. In declining markets and under conditions of close competition turnover taxes would frequently have to be borne by the seller, and in many instances might for him be an added cause of loss. Even if passed on through addition to the price paid by the buyer, it would almost inevitably be pyramided, causing material increases in many prices paid by consumers.

"'RUINOUS EFFECT OF PRICE PYRAMIDING

"'There are still more fundamental considerations weighing against such a tax. One of the objections to the excess-profits tax would apply with added force; this is uncertainty in yield of revenues, for gross sales fluctuate more widely than net income. If any form of turnover tax were imposed, it would result in advantages for large industrial undertakings which begin their processes with raw materials and carry them through to the finished product; such "integrated" industries would be subject to the tax but once, whereas their smaller competitors, acquiring materials from independent sources, would have the tax in their prices several times and probably increased in effect through pyramiding. Finished articles imported from abroad would have a similar advantage over domestic manufactures.

"'REPUDIATES PRINCIPLE OF TAXING ACCORDING TO ABILITY TO PAY

"'Perhaps the greatest inequity, however, would appear in the proportionate results of any of the taxes here under consideration upon the person with small income as compared with the person of large income. At the bottom of the economic scale are persons whose income barely suffices to provide them with necessities of the poorest quality and in the smallest amount, and at the other end of the scale are persons whose expenditures for necessities, no matter how large, represent but a fraction of their income. Any tax falling upon general expenditures is consequently disproportionately heavier for persons of smaller incomes as compared with persons of larger incomes. To the extent sales taxes of the sorts that have been suggested were used as a general source of revenue there would be a departure from the principle that taxes should be levied in accordance with ability to pay.

"'OF DOUBTFUL LEGALITY

"'Finally there would seem to be legal difficulties in the way of a general sales tax. Opinions handed down by the Supreme Court in March and June of this year make it clear that such a tax is not authorized by the income-tax amendment to the Constitution. Whether or not it would be held by the courts to be an indirect tax is uncertain; if it were held to be a direct tax, it would, under the Constitution, have to be apportioned among the States in accordance with their population, an obviously impracticable procedure. Reliance for revenues in large amount should not in any event be placed upon a tax regarding the legality of which there is doubt.'

"MEN WHOSE REPORTS CARRY WEIGHT

"The character of the National Industrial Board tax committee, that prepared a long, comprehensive report, may be ascertained from the following personnel:

"'F. R. Plumb, chairman, Philadelphia.
"'C. A. Andrews, Gloucester, Mass.
"'J. A. Emory, Washington.
"'R. C. Allen, Cleveland.
"'Wilson Compton, secretary N.L.M. Association.
"'F. W. Lehmann, Kansas City.
"'H. C. McKenzie, Walton, N.Y.
"'M. W. Alexander, New York City.
"'A. G. Duncan, Boston.
"'R. P. Hazzard, Gardiner, Maine.
"'Paul Armitage, New York City.
"'J. J. Forstall, Chicago.
"'L. F. Loree, New York City.
"'H. H. Smith, Tulsa, Okla.'

"The committee that signs the tax report for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is—

"'R. G. Rhett, chairman, Charleston, S.C.
"'Arthur Anderson, Chicago.
"'J. H. Gray, Northfield, Minn.
"'J. L. Laughlin, Boston.
"'T. B. Stearns, Denver.
"'R. G. Elliott, Chicago.
"'F. R. Fairchild, New Haven.
"'J. I. Straus, New York City.
"'E. W. Stix, St. Louis.'

"The importance of interests represented and ability of these men will not be questioned by anyone who examines their respective reports.

"Mr. Chairman, it must be kept in mind that these business interests are acting for their own protection because of the uncertain character of a turnover consumption tax. When it does not shift it threatens the industry compelled to pay it and when it shifts to the consumer he is unjustly compelled to pay a tax now paid out of corporations' excess profits.

"The authorities quoted will carry weight to most minds of the absolute danger attending a turnover consumption tax.

"EXPERTS WHO CAN TESTIFY

"Another list of authorities can be quoted whose names are legion. They consist of the farmers, clerks, skilled and common labor, housewives, and others not enumerated, who are glad to earn enough to get food and clothes and to give their children a common-school education. They are the ones who will be called upon to pay 90 percent and over of the proposed consumption taxes now paid by corporation excess profits and high supertaxes on personal incomes.

"Any advocate of average intelligence can safely take his case to this class of experts and secure a verdict against a turnover consumption tax 9 times out of 10, either in a judicial, legislative, or political forum, and the tax, if passed, will be tried out without doubt by the last-named court, and the one of last resort—the people at the first opportunity given to register their disapproval at the polls.

"WHOM DOES CONGRESS CONSULT IN REVENUE LEGISLATION?

"Presumably no more reliable adviser for Congress on revenues exists than the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is to properly and economically collect revenues and carry on the fiscal policy of the Government. He has for his advisers Government tax experts and men of Nation-wide reputation without private or personal ends to protect or advance. He is concerned in both revenue to be obtained and method of administration. In his 1920 annual report Secretary Houston condemns a proposed sales tax, as follows (p. 28):

"'In the Treasurer's opinion there are many grave objections to a sales tax. Further consideration of the subject has convinced me that a general sales or turnover tax is altogether inexpedient. It would apply not only to the necessities of life—the food and clothing of the very poor—but it would similarly raise the prices of the materials and equipment used in agriculture and manufactures. It would confer in effect a substantial bounty upon large corporate combinations and place at corresponding disadvantage the smaller or disassociated industries which carry on separately the business operations that in many combinations and trusts are united under one ownership. The group of independent producers would pay several taxes, the combinations would pay only one tax. Finally, it would add a heavy administrative load to the Bureau of Internal Revenue which * * * is already near the limit of its capacity. Simplification of the tax laws and restriction rather than extension of its scope are as important from the standpoint of successful administration as from that of the taxpayers' interests.'

"ADMINISTRATION OF A GENERAL SALES TAX

"Mr. Adams, a Treasury income-tax expert, says on this point in the Ways and Means Committee hearings:

"'If you have the income tax with all the necessary difficulties and you have the corporation tax with all its necessary difficulties and you have the principal present consumption taxes, it is going to be a dangerous thing from an administrative standpoint to add a general sales tax, which will bring in possibly a million new taxpayers to take care of, together with all the added complications of a new and Nation-wide tax * * * (p. 28).'

"His replies to questions of administration are illuminating:

"'Mr. FREAR. How many employees does the Treasury Department have engaged in this particular work (collecting taxes)?

"'Dr. ADAMS. I shall have to ask you to let me put that figure in the record (these figures, p. 36, show 18,440 employees).

"'Mr. FREAR. What would be the number of employees required in addition to cover the final sales tax in checking up?

"'Dr. ADAMS. That depends entirely upon the accuracy with which these reports were checked. You can simply put a sales tax on the statute books and leave it to enforce itself, and it doesn't require very much force to handle it.

"'Mr. FREAR. But you spoke yesterday of the different forms, and that is my reason for going back to it.

"'Dr. ADAMS. And that ought not be done. We are experiencing a perfectly enormous amount of evasion with respect to some sales taxes, such as are imposed by section 630, the soda-fountain drinks and taxes of that kind, because we haven't got an adequate force to check them up and supervise them.'

"A 100-PERCENT INCREASED PRICE FOR SOFT DRINKS

"It is certain that a 1-percent turnover sales tax would be pyramided, so that in a half dozen or 10 turnovers the padded price in each turnover sale would make a ballooning of prices as wild in character and as burdensome in effect as were war-time prices. Two or three illustrations are readily available.

"During a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee December 21, Senator Hardwick, now Governor of Georgia, was discussing the effect of a luxury tax on soft drinks, when the following facts were developed:

"'Mr. HARDWICK. Bottled goods that has a standard and uniform price throughout the country of 5 cents were immediately increased to the consumer (after levying of a 1-percent luxury tax or one-half-cent tax on 5-cent sale) until the article that formerly sold at 5 cents cost the consumer 7 to 10 cents * * *.

"'Mr. FREAR. Wouldn't that apply, Senator, to the sales tax ordinarily; that is, without relation to the exact tax which the seller will be obliged to pay? He will place upon goods a price that will make even change.

"'Mr. HARDWICK. I have no doubt in my own mind, speaking personally, that that is true, and I understand that the gentleman who presented the matter to your committee yesterday admitted that when that is passed on, ultimately, it always gains a little, like the snowball going downhill in wintertime * * * (p. 135).

"'Mr. FREAR. You say that these soft drinks were formerly sold for 5 cents?

"'Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

"'Mr. FREAR. Then what tax was added by Congress?

"'Mr. HARDWICK. Ten percent.

"'Mr. FREAR. Then the same soft drinks were sold for 10 cents?

"'Mr. HARDWICK. They were sold at from 6 and 7 to 10 cents.

"'Mr. FREAR. In that case they added 10 times the tax, did they not, if sold for 10 cents?

"'Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.'

"This increase of 100 percent in price and 950-percent tax increase is submitted of the workings of a sales tax.

"HOW IT WORKS NOW WITH CIGARS, 400 PERCENT TAX INCREASE

"Equally to the point and almost as greatly padded is the proposed price of a cigar from 8 cents to 9 cents, because of a suggested increase in duty of $2 a thousand, or one fifth of a cent for each cigar. The following from the hearings of January 21 before the Ways and Means Committee illustrates the same evil:

"'Mr. LONGWORTH. How much would you add to cover that fifth of a cent ($2 a thousand additional duty)?

"'Mr. KRAUSS. We have no medium of exchange for selling goods at fifths of cents.

"'Mr. LONGWORTH. How much would it add per cigar? As a matter of fact, you would add 2 cents, would you not, or would you add a cent? How much would that add to the retail price? It would probably add 1 cent, so that there would be a profit of four fifths of a cent to the cigar?

"'Mr. KRAUSS. Not to the manufacturer; probably to the dealer.

"'Mr. LONGWORTH. If the duty was added, that would be one fifth of a cent for each cigar. According to you that would add 1 cent to the selling price to the consumer, or make a net additional profit of four fifths of a cent?

"'Mr. KRAUSS. Yes; provided you have those units to work with.

"'Mr. LONGWORTH. * * * And you say that would add 2 cents to the cost of a cigar?

"'Mr. KRAUSS. I did not say 2 cents, I said probably 1 cent, because there is not any intermediate method of exchange.'

"Mr. Chairman, that principle could be and undoubtedly would be applied to every turnover sales tax where the amount of tax was too small to have any other 'intermediate method of exchange.'

"It must be remembered that the soft-drink and cigar tax was not levied until the sale was made by the wholesaler or retailer to the customer, and these sales did not involve more than two turnovers with only one tax, whereas the proposed turnover sales tax sought to be enacted into law would mean a tax levied and collected on from 8 to 10 turnovers in some instances, as have been heretofore disclosed.

"Nothing need be added by way of argument to show how vicious and mischievous a turnover sales tax is certain to be when nothing prevents the cupidity of the seller, on the one hand, from taking advantage of the necessity or ignorance of the consumer, on the other, with a well-founded possibility that wholesale evasions of the tax or neglect to report will ensue, as stated in findings of the National Industrial Board's committee.

"TAXING AND PADDING FROM PRODUCER TO CONSUMER, 400-PERCENT INCREASE

"Only one further illustration will be offered. When the railway bill was before Congress last session, Director General Hines stated that an increase of $875,000,000 in freight rates would mean an increase to the consumer of $4,375,000,000, or 400-percent increase, because, as stated by Chairman Woolley, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, 'The shipper passes this along to the consumer and on back to the producer of the raw material, who has to stand the cost of transportation.'

"The effect of increased freight rates that has served to prevent any reduction of ordinary commodities to pre-war prices from a riot of padding and ballooning of prices is also made possible in a sales tax under the beneficent consumption turnover tax plan.

"SALES TAX LAWS, WHERE AND HOW ENFORCED TODAY

"Without attempting to set forth specific terms or scope of existing sales tax laws it is noted that—

"Canada's sales tax law of 1915 (assented to July 1, 1920) provides for a tax on banking and negotiable instruments. The tax is laid on final sales of various luxuries and on high-priced wearing apparel not ordinarily worn by 10 percent of the people with a minimum price fixed by law above which the tax applies. A tax also is collected on goods sold by wholesalers and jobbers, but not on plain foodstuffs.

"The French turnover tax (1920) applies to luxuries set forth in schedules A and B of the law as distinguished from necessities and is much like the Canadian law, in that it does not reach necessary foodstuffs. The French law was passed by a government with less than one third the estimated wealth of our own and with a national debt of $35,000,000,000, or double our own after crediting foreign loans. Its sales tax law, enacted to meet a critical national financial emergency, has been in force less than 1 year, but actual receipts have only reached about 47 percent of those estimated by its advocates when the law was passed. Due to many exemptions and presumable difficulty in administration, Canadian receipts from the sales tax in that country are in like manner disappointing.

"The Philippine, 1917, Mexican, 1906, and German, 1920, turnover taxes should each and all delight the hearts of Messrs. Kahn, Bache, and Rothschild, leading exponents of the tax here, although the gentlemen named have not found any of these countries sufficiently attractive to renounce citizenship or residence in the United States because of more agreeable tax laws to be found elsewhere.

"The Philippine tax has been pointed to as a model for the United States. Industries in the Philippines are largely found in or around its one large city, Manila, and due to isolation of the islands the law is not difficult to administer. This turnover sales tax is a relic of the old Spanish regime, and the tax was also laid by Spain on Mexico. It is a legacy from a Government that notably failed in its cruel administration in both these countries, and curiously enough no law of the kind is in effect in Spain. I quote hereafter as to the Philippine and Mexican methods of administration, if to be applied here, based on statement of H. B. Fernald, of New York City, before the industrial tax board (p. 66, hearings).

"It is also noteworthy that a statement from Martin R. Browne, of New York, urging the Philippine sales tax on Congress claims the same rate of tax which raises $7,000,000, or $1 per capita, in the Philippines will raise $2,000,000,000, or $20 per capita, in the United States. In view of the further argument that a sales tax is practically a poll tax based on consumption of each taxpayer, the effect of the argument is clear that the American citizen will pay 20 times as much as the Filipino under the same kind of tax.

"Germany's turnover tax law approaches the ideal tax pictured by advocates of the system. Its name there, 'umsatzsteuergeset', comprehends several turnovers at the outset. The law levies turnover taxes on sales, both wholesale and retail, but its exemptions thoughtfully cover a number of banking transactions, including exchanges of banknotes, paper money, etc., which exemptions would presumably be urged by 'experts' for any law enacted here.

"A tax of 1½ percent on necessaries, 15 percent on sales classed as luxuries, and 10 percent on all advertisements not connected with public elections in Germany contribute toward the $57,000,000,000 indemnity burden recently levied by Great Britain, France, and Belgium on a defeated foe, but why should Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, or Goldsmith, its advocates here, collect their pound of flesh from the American laborer, whose needs are to be substituted for excess-profits taxes just because that tax is yielded up in Germany through force of arms?

"England has repudiated any turnover tax sales law, root or branch. Canada and France are conducting very limited experiments with luxury taxes that are disappointing and irritating in administration and revenue.

"The only turnover sales tax laws in governments of comparative importance are found in Mexico and Germany, where the iron hand of revolution has turned over governments and ruthlessly imposed turnover taxes as one of the chief fruits of revolution.

"Do we want such laws for the United States? If so, why?

"WHO IS PUSHING A SALES TAX?

"Let us now examine the 'experts' and authorities (?) who are pressing a turnover sales tax on Congress. Singularly enough, none of the 20 members of the tax committees representing two of the largest commercial organizations in the country was called before the Ways and Means Committee to give us the benefit of their study and investigations, nor do these important reports appear anywhere in the hearings, nor has any reference been made to them to my knowledge.

"Practically the only witnesses who have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, aside from Dr. Adams, of the Treasury Department, are Julius Bache, a banker and broker, New York City; Otto Kahn, a banker and broker, New York City; and Meyer Rothschild, also from New York City; although Mr. Klein and Mr. Goldsmith, 'accountants', also appear on different phases of the income tax law as it affects their clients.

"Few men realize the amount of money that is involved in the propaganda to enact a turnover-sales tax that is being sent out. One of the letters that I have says that 300,000 copies of the pamphlet of Mr. Bache's is being printed, as stated. Mr. Bache and Mr. Rothschild are taking part in the propaganda advocating a turnover-sales tax. Why? To relieve themselves and their associates from the excess-profits tax which they are paying and from the surtax on their personal incomes.

"Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. FREAR. I will.

"Mr. LINTHICUM. Where does the gentleman get the information that Mr. Bache is advocating the turnover tax in order to get rid of the excess-profits tax?

"Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will do me the honor to read my remarks in the RECORD, he will find that he specifically says so. I have a number of documents on my desk to that effect.

"Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the gentleman is making a rash statement.

"Mr. FREAR. Not so rash as the gentleman may believe. Mr. Bache, when asked by the Industrial National Board Committee on Taxation, 'How can you lower the consumption tax?' said, in effect, 'By not consuming.' The people of the United States are to be invited not to eat, not to wear clothes, in order not to pay the taxes he would have levied. He says, in effect, that 11 months of the year the average taxpayer is spending his time trying to dodge taxes. He says of Congress that we are subject to the influences of those who confuse the issue for us. Only Bache and a few others of that type are able to determine difficult taxation questions, according to his views. Let me read briefly from his 'review', of which 300,000 copies were printed by an ardent admirer. He says:

"'To continue to raise this amount (four to five billion dollars per year) by excess-profits taxes and heavy income taxes means the complete elimination, in our opinion, of the resources of the investors upon whom this country and its enterprises have been dependent. * * * Yet merchants have had to pay out of either income taxes or excess-profits taxes practically all that they have earned over their living expenses. * * * An economic tax should be substituted. There is only one way to escape this and that is through a tax on sales, in which every citizen of the United States as well as any foreigner who may live within our shores will pay equally toward the expenses of the Government.'

"I could quote many other equally happy thoughts suggested by Mr. Bache.

"Another peculiar circumstance lies in the enormous propaganda for a turnover consumption tax, which has been testified to before our committee by Bache and Rothschild and is evidenced by a constant deluge of addresses and pamphlets from Bache, Kahn, and Rothschild in favor of this tax.

"For illustration, a letter from the International Tag Co., Chicago, dated January 6, 1921, says of a pamphlet issued by Bache: 'We—the International Tag Co.—have reprinted and distributed more than 300,000 of them among business men all over the United States.' As I am personally compelled to pay for these remarks, I do not feel able to print over 1 percent of the number of Bache's pamphlet sent out by the tag company alone. With their great financial connections and well-known methods of propaganda, it may be assumed that the costs of financing this consumption-tax propaganda is upward of $1,000,000, the estimate of an older member of the Ways and Means Committee. Such an investment will give a hundredfold return to wealthy interests concerned if a turnover consumption tax can be substituted for the present excess-profits tax.

"DISCREDITED 'EXPERTS' FAVOR A SALES TAX

"Another peculiar fact is that Bache, Kahn, and Rothschild all urged their proposed turnover consumption tax before the National Industrial Conference held in New York City last October, and they were practically the only advocates of that tax there, and they were emphatically turned down, as shown by the committee report heretofore quoted.

"In view of the fact that this is the most important revenue measure ever presented to Congress in times of peace, I repeat that it is strange that the discredited 'experts', who may not be experts, who were repudiated by the New York conference of 25 industrial associations, have been practically the only men called before our committee to advise Congress on this vastly important revenue measure.

"Where were Plum, Andrews, Zoller, McKenzie, Howard, and Seligman, the last-named a tax expert of international reputation, whereas Bache and Kahn are only New York bankers and stockbrokers who desire to shift their taxes to the shoulders of the multitude? They are not even business men in the broad sense of employing labor.

"These New York bankers, brokers, and accountants have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee for the purpose of preventing our feet from going astray. Likewise they have circularized the country repeatedly with their views on excess-profits taxes, which they declare must be repealed, and for a consumption turnover sales tax enacted as a substitute. Due to the air of finality with which they pass upon the duties of Congress and on the 'atmospheric' conditions at Washington, a few words are proper to determine the qualifications of these New York 'experts' who assume to speak for the best interests of 105,000,000 people whom Congress represents. Criticisms of capabilities, motives, and influences in Congress have been freely indulged in by some of these self-appointed legislative experts and critics, according to propaganda at hand, so that it may be wise to inquire into the surrounding influences and expert knowledge of guides who would direct the feet of Congress in the tax wilderness.

"UNIQUE TRAINING OF SALES-TAX EXPERTS

"First and foremost is Mr. Otto Kahn, banker and broker, a close second is Mr. Jules Semon Bache, same business, while Messrs. Kline, Rothschild, and Goldsmith, all from New York City, speak in general harmony and all work to the same end—to urge upon Congress the necessity of protecting New York bankers who have been vamped by the excess-profits tax and who see their regeneration only through a consumption sale tax law—consumption, because if enacted into law it will consume a large part of the scanty means of the 100,000,000 people who have no excess profits but whom Congress also represents.

"Singularly enough, Germany has no tax system comparable to Mr. Kahn's consumption-tax plan, while Great Britain, which he says has 'a wise financial system,' holds firmly onto its excess-profits tax. This tax Mr. Kahn wants repealed here, and yet England rejects a turnover sales tax, which he would saddle onto America, the country of his adoption in 1917.

"A second tax authority appearing before the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Jules Semon Bache, banker, began business many years ago with Leopold Cohen, another New York banker. Mr. Bache's disinterested judgment on tax matters will be appreciated from the fact that he is reported in the same 'Who's Who' to be a director in the Cuba Distilling Co.; United States Industrial Alcohol Co.; Anniston City Land Co.; American Indemnity Co.; Empire Trust Co.; First Mortgage Guarantee Co.; International Banking Co.; St. Louis & Western Railroad Co., etc. In other words, Mr. Jules Semon Bache, banker, is a very busy man, but finds a few spare minutes to tell Congress how to legislate, as I shall hereafter submit. The effect of repealing the excess-profits law ought to save enormous profits to the various concerns Mr. Bache represents.

"Messrs. Rothschild, Goldsmith, and Kline, from New York, are of the same tax 'atmospheric' with Mr. Otto Kahn and Mr. Jules Semon Bache, and their efforts to direct Congress in their spare moments from business duties are entitled to weight proportionate to their disinterestedness and general knowledge of the subject.

"SEVERAL HUNDRED BUSINESS MEN VERSUS THESE SALES-TAX 'EXPERTS'

"Several hundred large-business men have been before the Ways and Means Committee urging modification of the tariff during the past month. The number of men who have addressed us reaches over 500. These men represent hundreds of millions of dollars of business investments and employ hundreds of thousands of men. Every business man before us urged upon the committee the fact that he could compete with all other business men here or abroad if given reasonable tariff protection and could make reasonable profits. Not one complaint came from the hundreds of business men so testifying that they were prevented from doing business or unfairly affected by the excess-profits tax. Not one of these men suggested to the committee that a sales tax of any kind should be substituted for an excess-profits tax. The only men who have pressed these arguments on the committee were Kahn and Bache and Rothschild and Goldsmith, bankers and brokers and accountants of New York City, who toil not and neither do they spin, compared with the hundreds of manufacturers and other employers of hundreds of thousands of day laborers mentioned.

"Keeping in mind that these last-named New York bankers and brokers are directly interested in shouldering the present excess-profits tax they pay from their own vaults over on the backs of the 'people who pay the freight', let me quote their own arguments from the record.

"Jules Semon Bache publishes the Bache Review, a weekly pamphlet, which on December 18, 1920, contained this statement sent broadcast throughout the country:

"'The atmosphere of Washington is so thick with political misconceptions of things as they really are that it has become a matter of the greatest doubt whether anything sound or sensible can be put through Congress on its merits.'

"Bache says of his proposals to solve Treasury difficulties by refunding $2,350,000,000 of certificates and Victory notes:

"'So sane and sound a proposition as this was met immediately with befogging objections of politically saturated Congressmen who pleaded the old slogan about breaking faith with the people. * * * It never seemed to have occurred to anyone that it would be easy to fund the whole debt in long-term higher-rate bonds.'

"Mr. Bache's funding scheme contemplated putting higher-rate Government bonds on the market.

"Speaking of different hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, Bache says:

"'The most practical and workable advice should go out * * * from the best informed, soundest, and ablest men, especially business men, who will look at the whole subject from the practical side.'

"He continues:

"'Mr. Fordney is the only one who has given out intelligence of this character.'

"Which tribute to the chairman members of the committee do not resent, but Bache says further of Dr. Thomas S. Adams, Treasury expert:

"'He calls himself a tax expert * * *. His one object besides throwing dust in the eyes of the people on the question of a turnover tax is to find some complicated, difficult, and illogical substitute for the excess-profits tax.'

"This was written and circulated by Mr. Bache many weeks after he and his sales-tax proposal had been repudiated by the National Industrial Board Tax Committee. But banker and broker Bache finds a ray of hope notwithstanding Adam's attitude, because in his pamphlet he says:

"'We understand that although Mr. Fordney stated openly that they would always have Professor Adams present in formulating the new bill, the members of the Ways and Means Committee state on the side that they are not going to pay any attention to him.'

"Having bombarded Dr. Adams with this 10-inch shell, fired in the name of the Ways and Means Committee, Herr Bache keeps up a machine-gun fire at the committee with other equally unreliable testimony.

"'Expert' communications forwarded to Members of Congress from Mr. Bache are supplemented by his statement before the Ways and Means Committee, December 17, 1920, from which I briefly quote regarding his proposed sales tax. He says:

"'The purchaser does not pay it (the tax) in so much money, but it comes out of the purchase price. You can add it to your price or your bill, but unless the ultimate consumer pays the tax, it is not a sales tax * * * (p. 86).

"'It is not a perfect tax. Now, I am only a student. I do not know the tax. Nobody knows that has not seen it working. * * * It will be paid every month, with the least amount of difficulty in raising the money and making the least amount of trouble in a banking community.'

"Mr. Bache, however, disclaims protecting the New York banking community by loading their taxes on the farmers, laborers, and public generally, who would pay a consumption tax. He believes the consumers pay this tax today, because he says he shifts it through his business methods. A few words from the hearings are illuminating:

"'Mr. GREEN. You spoke of making additions on account of the excess-profits tax. Where in the excess-profits tax would you make any corresponding reduction?

"'Mr. BACHE. Frankly, we did not. I would like to explain that in justice to my company. We found that our estimates had been too low before.

"'Mr. GREEN. Well, do you know of any company that did?

"'Mr. BACHE. I can only speak of those on whose boards I sit (p. 90).

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. RAINEY. Taxation has been defined to be a method of getting the most feathers with the least squawking of the goose.

"'Mr. BACHE. I agree with that. The sales tax will do that. There is no tax in the world that will ever get so much money (p. 87). If you gentlemen decide that a turnover tax should be tried, and you intitiate it at 1 percent, and you raise $4,000,000,000, you can simply redeem $2,000,000,000 of our debt, and nobody will be very much prejudiced (p. 91).

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. HULL. Your idea, then, is to base this tax and to base all taxes, as nearly as possible, on consumption?

"'Mr. BACHE. Yes, sir.

"'Mr. HULL. So that if a ranchman or a herdsman out in the West should consume more than Mr. Rockefeller, he would pay more taxes.

"'Mr. BACHE. Yes; if he is foolish enough to do it.

"'Mr. HULL. You think that the theory to tax according to ability is unsound?

"'Mr. BACHE. It is unsound in this country, because you can not * * * (p. 93).

"'Mr. HULL. The corporations made $10,700,000,000 net for one year (the last 3½ years).

"'Mr. BACHE. Yes; and you had war to make it for them.

"'Mr. HULL. Do you know to what extent organizations are being developed to propagandize its movement and secure the enactment of the (sales) tax?

"'Mr. BACHE. I cannot say that I do. I have come in contact with a number of gentlemen in New York who are engaged with retail organizations who have committees. I know that the American Bankers' Association have appointed a special tax committee in connection with this tax (p. 95).

"'Mr. BACHARACH. You have spent a great deal of money yourself? (p. 95).

"'Mr. BACHE. I have spent more than I can afford in view of my taxes, because I am getting out of business and putting my money into municipal bonds as fast as I can' (p. 96).

"Mr. Bache is not a philanthropist; he is living in America to enjoy its privileges, its schools, its laws, and its armies that saved his money from German indemnity. He does not intend to pay for them himself. He lives in luxury, makes money protected by our laws—a wealthy banker and broker—and he tells Congress he is placing all his money in tax-exempt bonds as fast as he can, so others may pay his just tax burdens. If ever a capital tax was justified it appears to be found in the case of Jules Semon Bache, who wants a sales tax placed on the 100,000,000 people that make up the great mass of our population in order to save him the inconvenience of making out an excess-profits tax report and paying his share of taxes.

"Mr. Bache has no sentiment or false pretenses to offer. He knows what he wants and is not backward in saying so. Although he stood practically alone among many tax experts and business men at the national industrial session in his extreme demands, he now lays down the law he wants enacted with a 'me and Gott' emphasis that speaks highly for his confidence in himself, as once did another gentleman now residing in Holland. Bache wants to escape all taxes, excepting on what he eats, drinks, and wears. With his wealth snugly tucked away in safe-keeping, he says, in effect, he will put every dollar in tax-exempt bonds unless we pass his sales tax and cut the surtax in two. This is his ultimatum, and, as stated one admirer, a 'tag' company writes Congress it is so captivated by Bache's arguments that it has caused to be printed 300,000 copies of his pamphlet for circulation.

"Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. FREAR. I will.

"Mr. LAZARO. How much property is there not being taxed in the United States?

"Mr. FREAR. If you accept the statement of Kahn, Rothschild, and Bache, they say the ultimate consumer eventually pays every dollar of the tax himself.

"Mr. LAZARO. I am talking about the property that does not bear taxation, property that is exempt from taxation.

"Mr. FREAR. The gentleman means exempt securities?

"Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

"Mr. FREAR. I can not give the gentleman the exact amount, but it runs into the billions of dollars, four or five billion, and it might be more than that. The figures were given me by Mr. Leffingwell, and I will embody them in my remarks. Those are securities that gentlemen are investing in today who object to paying taxes, and by that investment they desire to avoid their fair share of the taxes.

"Mr. LINTHICUM. The purchase by investors of tax-exempt securities is gradually reducing the returns of excess profits.

"Mr. FREAR. Unquestionably, and that is one of the problems the committee will have to contend with. We have got to raise taxes in some way, and the question whether you are to impose it on every man, woman, and child, which would mean a head tax, or secure it from profits is an important question.

"I offer the following data from committee hearings of March 11, 1920 (p. 491):

"'Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell was questioned regarding outstanding stocks and bonds subject to investment. The purpose of the question was to ascertain what amount of securities were tax exempt and open to investment by those seeking to avoid personal-income taxes.

"'Te data was confined by Mr. Leffingwell to United States securities and the data submitted, as of 1905, affords little information of conditions today. As evidence of its inaccuracy I submit a statement of railway securities in 1917 according to the 1920 World Almanac, as follows:

"'"Common stock, $7,454,610,000; preferred stock, $1,847,920,931.

"'"Mortgage bonds, $9,227,374,055, amounting to approximately eighteen and one-half billion dollars. If other securities have increased proportionately the amount of State, county, and municipal bonds have reached over $4,000,000,000, apart from Government bonds that are exempt from taxation. If any accurate data has been compiled on the subject, it has not come to my notice.'"

"I quote from Mr. Leffingwell's statement:

"'Mr. FREAR. One other thing: Is there any place where an estimate can be found of general securities in addition to Government securities? Here are outside commercial securities representing $100,000,000,000, possibly, and I ask whether there is any basis at all for estimating their amount or any authority to indicate the extent of such securities?

"'Mr. LEFFINGWELL. I imagine that the statisticians must have some figures as to the whole bulk of securities.

"'Mr. FREAR. Do you have anything on that which you would be willing to give? If so, just mention the authority, because it seems to me that is very material along this line—the estimated value of all securities on the market.

"'Mr. LEFFINGWELL. I will see if I can get that data. I would not be able to give you anything that I can vouch for, because when statisticians take to making figures of that sort without a census they are bound to use figures that are not precisely accurate.

"'Mr. FREAR. But, anyway, give us some information if you can.

"'Mr. LEFFINGWELL. Yes.'

NOTE.—Taken from Charles A. Conant's The World's Wealth in Negotiable Securities (Atlantic Monthly, January 1908, p. 102).

"On this point Mr. Bache says:

"'You may amend your Constitution to make future municipal bonds tax-bearing but you can not make past ones—I am not a lawyer—but you cannot make the $16,000,000,000, or whatever amount there is outstanding, to be taxed; and that is quite large enough to cover our large fortunes' (p. 97, Ways and Means Committee hearings).

"Mr. Bache has estimates of $16,000,000,000, and he may be nearer the correct figures than those based on Leffingwell's data. In any event, Mr. Bache says, 'It is quite large enough to cover our large fortunes", and that is the important question involved. In England they have even suggested a capital tax, and it has been contended for very strongly. That is one of the things that we wish to avoid here.

"Mr. LINTHICUM. Had we not better remove some of these securities from taxation?

"Mr. FREAR. The only way that we can remove them would be by refunding bonds in the form of tax bonds, but beyond that we can only act by amendment to the Constitution, which seems to be the only way, in view of the opinion of the Supreme Court. It will take a long period to secure an amendment to the Constitution that will require all bonds to be subject to Federal taxation.

"'WHEN IS A TAX SHIFTED?' BY MR. ROTHSCHILD

"Mr. Rothschild ran Kahn and Bache a close race in his testimany before the committee, as will appear from the record:

"'Mr. TREADWAY. Where would the turnover tax go?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. On the consumer. * * * (p. 108).

"'Mr. FREAR. Let us suppose competition is keen, then what happens?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. Then it is a question of price cutting and that would be regardless of tax.

"'Mr. FREAR. And if there is no competition whatever, does it (excess-profits tax) form any element in price fixing?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. If there is no competition and its profits are large, it is very largely a question of the policy of the man. I understand lately there was a coal man who had not raised his prices during the war (Mr. Rothschild could not name this white blackbird). * * *

"'Mr. FREAR. Suppose that prices are falling, do merchants continue to add excess profits?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. When prices are falling men save themselves and the excess profits do not cut any more ice than the rent or other expenses. * * *

"'Mr. FREAR. The question of efficiency and of expenditures in every corporation differs?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. FREAR. Now, do you insist that the excess-profits tax during recent times has been an element in fixing the final cost in various lines of business?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. Yes, sir.

"'Mr. FREAR. Is it not a fact that many of these companies have been giving out stock dividends reaching 50 percent and more, and have they not been charging all the public will pay?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. Most of them (p. 112).

"'Mr. FREAR. Mr. Rothschild, your theory is that the seller is going to add the sales tax when he charges the consumer?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. The wholesaler; the retailer will put it into his overhead.

"'Mr. FREAR. If there are 10 turnovers, there will be 10 people to sell, and they will add the tax in each instance?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. We will admit that because it is the worst case that could be made against us. It very often will not happen. But we will admit it.

"'Mr. FREAR. Now, on each one of these turnovers, do you believe that the seller is going to add only the tax in making his sale? Is he going to add the 1-percent tax, or will he add 4 or 5 percent additional?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. That would depend upon his competitors.'

"ROTHSCHILD'S BIG PROPAGANDA

"'Mr. GARNER. Now be honest with us. In your heart you would do it if you could (repeal the income tax)?

"'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. In my heart I believe nearly every dollar of income tax is somehow or other paid through business operations. * * * We are going out to the people of the United States and there is going to be a very big campaign to hold up our hands. We are going to have the chambers of commerce and the boards of trade of the United States discuss this question. Now, wherever I have been—and I have had the pleasure recently of talking to the Chambers of Commerce of Boston, Providence, and other places—the merchants almost unanimously favor this tax.'

"In a 31-page pamphlet furnished the Ways and Means Committee by Meyer Rothschild he says:

"'My own personal view is that business, through the medium of a small turnover tax, could well pay the entire cost of economically running the Government, take care of the great national debt, and permit the dropping of all other kinds of Federal taxation. Such an exclusive tax would naturally eliminate the personal income tax and relieve business from the burden of providing the additional interest dividends or profits which it must now furnish to pay the income tax.'

"Quoting the effect of an indirect sales tax he says, page 12:

"'It is safe to assume that in the past for every dollar the Government has collected, either as duty or imports or excise tax on liquor and tobacco, the consumer paid at least $2 on 100 percent profit on the duty or excise tax, which additional dollar the Government did not get.'

"According to Senator Hardwick, heretofore quoted, the increase was 10 times the Government tax on a single sale.

"MR. KAHN'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE CAUSE

"Mr. Kahn also speaks from the standpoint of a banker and broker, whose annual income doubtlessly reaches far beyond the $100,000 mark, possibly double that amount. He speaks from the viewpoint of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York, his business house, who are charged in a recent pamphlet received by all Congressmen with having milked the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad out of $27,586,650. Letter dated Baltimore, December 1920, from Isaac M. Cote.

"'Mr. Kahn indulges in constant declamations as to his disinterestedness and advises his business associates to use a small stick rather than a bludgeon in driving Congress to drink at the turnover-sales trough. Representing Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., and other great financial interests, doubtless he voices their views to an amount reaching many millions of dollars in annual taxes, so it is well to quote from his utterances.

"'Mr. Kahn is a frequent public speaker—"speech for release", and so forth.'

"In a public address, New York, January 12, 1921, printed on heavy calendered paper—'released for publication at 1 p.m. Wednesday, January 12, 1921'—sent to every Member of Congress, including Ways and Means Committee, he says:

"'It is a matter for congratulation that the House Committee on Ways and Means * * * is a very competent, well-informed, right-meaning, and level-headed body of men whose standard of ability and devotion to duty would rank high in any assembly, whether of politicians, business men, or men of any other calling.'

"This is not the judgment as heretofore quoted of his colaborer, Bache, by several hundred miles. After passing on the qualifications of a committee for whose benefit this broad flattery was offered, Mr. Kahn ingenuously:

"'Many men whose judgment I respect are almost passionately in favor of a turnover tax (almost passionately) and see in it the solution of the taxation problem. Others whose opinion I value equally highly are violently opposed to it * * *. I distinctly dissent from the extravagant arguments and excessive claims put forward by some of its advocates. * * *

"'I favor a turnover tax * * * as against a (single) tax on retail sales * * * because I doubt whether a retail sales tax, even at a rate four or five times as high as the one third percent which I suggest for a turnover tax, would be adequately productive.'

"He now puts the camel's nose under the tent at one third of 1 percent, which will produce five times the amount of a retail tax, according to his contention. If one fifth of a cent on cigars is increased five times to 1 cent and 5 cents on soft drinks to 10 cents in present sales, then the total turnover tax at a modest estimate would gain from 50 to 100 percent in increased price.

"In a New York address—'released for publication Monday, December 20, 1920'—Mr. Kahn says:

"'As to the sales tax, I admit I have wabbled and wavered on this subject. Indeed, it has taken me a long time to bring myself into a state of assured equilibrium concerning it.'

"After describing his mental gymnastics, that would do credit to a Blondin of old, he says to the New York business men he is addressing:

"'There is one further recommendation which I venture to make, namely, that the business community go slow in sponsoring any methods of taxation which may be calculated to create the impression upon the great body of public opinion that in their contribution to the thought on tax revision the representatives of business are mainly concerned with conserving their own interests and aiming to curtail their due share of the fiscal burden which the country must bear as a legacy of war.'

"Robbed of its verbiage, Mr. Kahn says, in effect:

"'Do not announce you are taxdodgers seeking to shift your tax load to the multitude, but when you demand a repeal of the excess profits law and the enactment instead of a turn-over consumption tax, just use a strong anesthetic and a sharp knife for the surgical and grafting operation.'

"In a 41-page pamphlet (January 1920) demanding the repeal of the excess-profits tax and enactment this time of a 1-percent sales tax (p. 34), Mr. Kahn says (p. 22):

"'Extravagance, logrolling, the unwise and inefficient expenditure of money by governmental bodies, count among the acknowledged foibles of democracy. The structure of our income-tax schedule encourages these foibles. * * *

"'By the opiate of such taxation, which apparently touches them but very little or not at all, the masses of the people are apt to be lulled into a sense of relative indifference to governmental wastefulness.'

"Then he proceeds to administer his own chloroform to prove that if these taxes are placed on the people direct, sometimes by a 1-percent sales tax, sometimes by a one-third-of-1-percent tax, over which he wabbles and wavers, then the effect on the 'masses of the people' who will pay the bills will be easier. In a tribute to big business and big business men Mr. Kahn says (p. 25):

"'No doubt the prevailing apportionment of monetary reward is not free from defects, but there has been a steady and pronounced tendency and movement, especially within this generation, toward mending such defects and remodeling inequitable conditions. Evolution and the irresistible powers which make for progress, enlightenment, and justice may be depended upon to continue and advance that process. There can be no turning back.'

"In the words of one Patrick Flarity, who yet remains unremodeled:

"'Them's beautiful words.'

"BRITISH AND AMERICAN TAXES

"In his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, December 21, 1920, Mr. Kahn further elucidates:

"'Mr. FREAR. Do they have the excess-profits tax (in Great Britain) now?

"'Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"'Mr. FREAR. And according to the statement before me it reaches 80 percent?

"'Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"'Mr. FREAR. You speak of Great Britain as a "wise financial country." ("In England which has shown itself in finance a very wise country and has had in that field the largest experience of any country", p. 15.) Do you think it would be well for us to adopt their plan, or, if not, do you think they should repeal their excess-profits tax?

"'Mr. KAHN. I do not think it would be wise for us to adopt their plan * * *. The leaders of the English business communities, rather unwisely, in my opinion, said they would rather get along with the evils of the excess profits than have a high, flat, corporate tax imposed (p. 164).

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. FREAR. Can you explain, Mr. Kahn, why Great Britain has no sales tax?

"'Mr. KAHN. * * * They do not like novelties and experiment, especially in the field of finance and economics.

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. FREAR. You would wipe out the excess-profits tax, that would bring $800,000,000 (for 1922), and substitute a sales tax?

"'Mr. KAHN. I would substitute for part the sales tax, and in part I would increase the corporation net-profits tax (p. 178).

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. KAHN. On the sales tax I have wabbled and wavered (p. 166).'

"When asked to make a radical departure in our methods of taxation and inaugurate a system nowhere in effect, on the scale proposed, in any country in the world, Congress and the country have a right to the unqualified approval of some recognized tax expert. That has not been given by any such expert to the Ways and Means Committee, but Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith have contented themselves as special pleaders for the bankers and big business interests that have hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes at stake.

"True, Mr. Kahn has been before our committee and flits around from one chamber of commerce to another throughout the country, expressing his carefully prepared views, but when before our committee he confessed with an apparent effort at frankness and ingenuousness that he (Kahn) had 'wabbled and wavered' on the sales tax (p. 166).

"Before the industrial conference at New York he admitted he still 'wabbled and wavered' on a sales tax (p. 90, industrial committee hearings).

"'Indeed, I am not yet in a state of assured equilibrium,' he adds in a communication to Congress (p. 25), and he continues that he, Kahn, a leader in the movement, has long 'wabbled and wavered' on a sales tax.

"In the most important act of his own career, choosing of citizenship, Mr. Kahn also 'wabbled and wavered' from German to English, and finally in 1917 to declaring allegiance to America, and his first important act as a wabbling citizen is to try and lay on the backs of 100,000,000 American citizens a vicious sales tax, that represents upward of $800,000,000 annual excess-profits taxes which he asks to have shifted off from the annual profits of his clients and associates.

"THE SALES TAX VERSUS A HEAD TAX

"Mr. Chairman, a short expeditious tax collection has been suggested by other authorities, that may yet be urged by Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith on Congress. It is much simpler than the excess-profits tax law, which causes these income authorities to spend sleepless nights in preparing tax reports. It will save them the necessity of investing their large incomes in tax-exempt securities in order to avoid the higher surtaxes. In fact, while it resembles a turnover sales tax, so ably defended by these gentlemen, in that it would reach every man, woman, and child through the food and clothing individually worn, yet it would save the objection of profiting and tax pyramiding which is a conceded evil of the turnover sales tax. It also reaches to the very base of fundamental taxation.

"It is urged Congress could reach the same result advocated by Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith and at the same time avoid a needless pyramiding turnover tax by enacting a poll or head tax. By transferring the $1,000,000,000 of excess profits and surtaxes that now worries those obliged to pay such taxes over to a poll or head tax the tax could not be avoided by the taxpayer and collection annually would then be as easy as taking the census.

"Messrs. Kahn and Bache might urge it be provided by law that the head of the house would pay a tax levy of $10 per head for each member of his family, based on the per-capita share of each inhabitant who is now asked to shoulder the $1,000,000,000 tax burden of the rich. If any tax was not promptly paid, it might hamper the Government to put the wage earner in jail; so, like the good old distress-for-debt practices in Germany and England, from which some of our modern sales-tax authorities spring, the law might seize a member of the family, say one of the children, who Bache says will not pay anyhow if it does not consume, and the wage earner would then be left free to earn the tax.

"Take the case of Mr. Bland, a constituent of Congressman Small, with 26 children; his head tax of $10 each would reach $280, which would include himself and his wife. In the case of a constituent of my own, with 17 living children, he would only have to raise $190, which would include himself and wife. Of course these farmers are also paying local taxes on their farms for the support of their schools, local improvements, and State institutions, but they might put in a few extra hours daily in earning the extra tax that Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith would then have taken from their own shoulders, and thus we would avoid the need of a general pyramiding sales tax.

"The system suggested would possess the additional virtue of having direct action, and that is what these New York bankers are seeking. True, Bland, the farmer, is probably working 14 hours a day already, while Kahn, Bache, and Rothschild have a minimum unwritten law of nearer 4 hours, and there may be other matters of detail that would arise, but, as Mr. Kahn well says, 'No law is absolutely perfect.' However, such a law would solve the mental struggles of excess-profits-tax payers and is well for them to consider as an alternative for the sales tax.

"Of course, Congress would take an extended leave-of-absence after passing any such measure, and probably the next Congress, of different members, might enact an extreme capital tax which would get more quick profits than under the present excess-profits-tax system; but as a temporary relief it is submitted that the kind of a tax for these distinguished gentlemen to advocate is a head tax, or poll tax, although the latter term would have a singularly unpleasant sound to those who had to submit their candidacies at the polls after enacting the law.

"PREJUDICED TAX EXPERTS

"Speaking personally, I believe Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and those they represent should be made to pay every dollar of taxes due from them under existing laws, and they should pay taxes according to their ability. Any attempt to avoid payment of taxes by investing in tax-exempt securities ought to be met, so far as possible, by drastic legislation until a constitutional amendment can be passed.

"The tax dodger of today is not the poor man whose home and farm is immediately sold for taxes, with stiff penalties when it is redeemed. He cannot avoid payment of his taxes by investment in tax-free securities or other means, and every dollar spent by him for taxes is ordinarily taken from some need of the family.

"The tax dodgers and prejudiced tax experts are not found among this class of people, but the man who unblushingly tells the Ways and Means Committee he is investing his surplus cash in tax-exempt bonds; who publicly says he spends 11 months of the year studying how to evade our tax laws; who says if the poor do not want to pay a sales tax they need not consume; who unblushingly declares in one breath that he shifts all his taxes over onto the ultimate consumer, while in the next breath he demands a repeal of the excess-profits tax, because it is a heavy burden on the rich; the wealthy banker who pompously says to the country in his 6 by 9 pamphlet that only one man on the Ways and Means Committee understands the revenue question, and therefore he—Bache—must come to Washington in order to instruct the committee regarding the tax he wants—this kind of tax expert will find few apologists, even among his own fellows, and he is out of touch with 99 percent of the 100,000,000 people for whom he asks Congress to pass a sales tax law.

"Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. FREAR. Yes.

"Mr. DENISON. Does this proposed plan of a sales tax cover the sales of real estate?

"Mr. FREAR. That is one tax that has been proposed. It would all depend upon what was embodied in the bill. That has been done in some countries and others not.

"WHO WILL PAY THE SALES TAX?

"Mr. Chairman, let us for a moment study a picture of human existence and the proposed taxation scheme.

"Of the 106,000,000 people in this country it is doubtful if 99 percent are making $5,000 annually, mentioned in one discussion by Mr. Kahn, nor do they pay any appreciable income tax. Ninety-five percent certainly are among those who grub along for less, and half of the total presumably are living on net incomes of $1,000 or less received by the family breadwinner. This amount has not much more than one half the purchasing power of 10 years ago. In other words, the astounding report that a large part of labor received $700 or less annually 10 years ago was no more serious than conditions of today—particularly when over 2,000,000 breadwinners are out of employment. Immaculately dressed Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith do not represent these people.

"Those they represent, who clipped bonds or interest coupons during the war, then took no chances. Their living expenses, luxuries, and limousines never occasion them worry now. Yet they protest against turning over to the Government part of their 'excess' profits, not of their reasonable profits but a part of their 'excess' profits. They declare that individual enterprise, ambition, and initiative will be hampered by parting with any excess profits.

"Of the 100,000,000 people whom Congress represents, I believe statistics would show 90 percent are no better off today financially than before the war, although the great demand for labor during the war is so recent that the country has not yet recovered from its financial orgy to take an accounting of stock. That is the situation confronting the country and Congress when Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith demand that 'the burden now upon the rich', to use Kahn's words, must be shifted to the 100,000,000. In other words, that an income of over a billion dollars, counting the excess profits, collections, and higher surtax now paid by less than 5 percent of our people, must be shifted over to the backs of the remaining 95 percent by a consumption tax. Under that beneficient proposal every turn-over tax will be paid as stated from the time sugar beets are first sold to the last sale of refined sugar by retailer; from the sale of wheat at the elevator to the final sale of bread or breakfast food by the grocer; from the sale of the steer or hog by the farmer to the sale of shoes by the retailer or wienerwursts by the lunch stand—and for every eater of porterhouse a score patronize the wienerwursts.

"PYRAMIDING FROM PRODUCER TO CONSUMER—WHERE DOES THE RETAILER COME IN?

"From 5 tax levies to 10 tax levies are made between the first sale and the last of the completed article, depending upon the 'turn-overs.' The tax may be insignificant, but after witnessing the cupidity, greed, and profiteering of the past 3 years in America, the public must pay, irrespective of cost or reasonable profits, and no sensible man believes that the tax added to the article by the different middlemen from first producer to final consumer will be that fixed by law. If it is 1 percent with five turn-overs it is more likely to be 25 percent by the time the many turn-overs occur, and before the finished article is received the turnover tax, and much more, is pyramided each time and is added to the cost of the article on which the next turnover tax is levied, as had been disclosed by Senator Hardwick. In many cases it is fair to suppose that where the Government would receive a total of 5 percent in taxes on the different values for which sold, the consumer will pay from 25 percent to 50 percent or even 100 percent additional, 90 percent of which additional charge will go into the tills of the different turnover dealers. That is one reason retail merchants and other dealers have no fault to find with the turnover sales tax plan and are easily caught by the argument.

"That is a reason why Mr. Lew Hahn, managing director of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, is said to be in conference with 'members of the Senate Finance Committee and of the Ways and Means Committee of the House' (Washington Times, Jan. 25).

"These retailers do not pay the sales tax which Mr. Hahn and Mr. Kahn and Mr. Bache and Mr. Rothschild and Mr. Goldsmith favor. The retailers are the ones who will pyramid prices and collect from the consumers large margins even as they try to do today.

"Notwithstanding manufacturers and wholesalers have slashed prices to retailers according to published statements, the large retailer still charges his heavy profit without yet having learned that the war ended more than 2 years ago. The retailer has nothing to fear from the turnover sales tax because he does not pay it—he passes it on to the consumer and his advocacy of the sales tax is entitled to close scrutiny particularly if he is now seeking to escape paying an excess-profits tax through the shift.

"EVERYBODY TO PAY THE SAME TAX

"Mr. Chairman, a sales tax hits the ultimate consumer who generally pays the final bill, including freight bills, taxes, and every charge that goes to make up the last selling price. All people will pay the same and thereby can learn the blessings of taxpaying in real earnest. The molder in the foundry will pay the same as Otto Kahn, banker, for his sugar, with the same profits and tax added in both cases; the miner digging coal will pay the same as Jules Bache, New York banker, for the meat, flour, and potatoes with the same tax added; the farmer will pay the same as Rothschild and Goldsmith for the same grade of shoes, shirts, or clothes, with the same tax added although neither Kahn nor Bache nor Rothschild will draw heavily on the kind of goods the farmer or laborer wears. The workman with his flivver will pay the same tax on his gasoline that Rockefeller himself pays, in order to pile up excess profits for Standard Oil that are no longer to be taxed according to Messrs. Bache, Kahn, Goldsmith, and Rothschild.

"The farmer will pay the new price for his ax and other tools that Carnegie exacts through the Steel Trust, and the excess-profits tax formerly paid by the trust is now to be shifted to the final purchaser—in order not to destroy initiative in business. The soldiers whom we sent to war to protect the property of Kahn et al. from German tribute—these service men who saved the day—will now pay the same turnover tax as Kahn et al. This is the beneficient scheme known as a 'consumption tax', or a 'turnover sales tax', that these bankers and financiers ask Congress to place on the backs of the 100,000,000 people whom we represent.

"In a hope of escaping excess-profits taxes the proponents of the repeal paint in somber colors the terrible distress of business occasioned by the excess-profits tax and the beautiful picture of every man bearing his own share of the burden under a consumption sales tax.

"Every business reverse, every annoyance, is laid to the excess-profits tax. When prices were high Kahn et al. claimed prices were high because the excess profits were always added. When the balloon burst and prices dropped Kahn et al. pointed to the drop as a business distress caused by the drain of an excess-profits tax. Notwithstanding the tax only reaches a part of the excess profits over reasonable profits of 8 percent, the tax is protested by many men who pay it in the same breath that they confidently declare they pass the tax on to the other fellow.

"One ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory, and a few unprejudiced witnesses are worth all the Kahns, Baches, Rothschilds, and Goldsmiths in the universe who are special pleaders for special interests.

"As heretofore stated, several hundred witnesses appeared before the Ways and Means Committee on tariff schedules. They employ hundreds of thousands of men in the aggregate and have paid many millions of dollars in excess-profits taxes on their factory earnings in the aggregate, yet not one of these men complained of the excess profits law as a hindrance to his business, nor as a bar to incentive. Search the hearings of these hundreds of witnesses, and not one seconds the demand of Messrs. Otto Kahn, Jules Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith, bankers, brokers, and special pleaders. What more significant illustration of the difference in attitude between the coupon-clipping and stock market juggling business compared to actual producers, employers of labor, and contributors to the country's prosperity? It is the difference between the broker and the producer, whether he be farmer, factory hand, or manufacturer.

"I respectfully submit that it is the height of folly to remove the excess-profits tax now paid by industries named and to place it on the backs of consumers as proposed by Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and others before the Ways and Means Committee.

"REAL TAX AUTHORITIES VERSUS 'WOBBLERS AND WAVERERS'

"Thus far I have presented to you the findings of two important tax committees, representing thousands of manufacturers and hundreds of chambers of commerce throughout the country. These findings in both cases specifically repudiate a consumption tax and point out dangers which would not occur to novices or superficial students of the subject. I have also quoted from the Secretary of the Treasury's report specifically rejecting a consumption tax both in principle and as an administrative proposition.

"Quotations have also been furnished showing conclusively that taxes are loaded and this heavy load in addition to the tax will be passed on to the consumer under a turnover consumption tax.

"These high authorities are opposed by several New York bankers, brokers, and accountants, one of whom, Mr. Kahn, has 'wobbled and wavered' for many months and has not yet found his equilibrium. Mr. Bache goes Mr. Kahn one better, as I have shown, and says all income taxes and all corporation taxes should be wiped out and a turnover consumption tax substituted. He adds that he is placing his own funds in tax-exempt securities as rapidly as possible. Mr. Rothschild believes like Mr. Bache, but does not advocate going the limit at this time. These three experts were before the National Industrial Board tax committee and their untested theories were there rejected. However, they are persistent; they have millions of dollars in annual taxes at stake among those they represent; they have a vigorous, expensive propaganda and are well organized.

"They were practically the only witnesses, by a curious circumstance, on the subject before the Ways and Means Committee, except Dr. Adams, and Bache informs the country in his pamphlet that he has grapevine intelligence; that Adams does not count with the Ways and Means Committee when it comes to preparing a bill. These are the financially interested witnesses who are seeking to have Congress relieve them of their taxes and to saddle their tax burdens on the general public.

"They point to Canada, Philippines, and France to prove that a turnover sales tax is desirable for the United States. At the risk of appearing to give undue weight to their arguments, I will quote from the opinions of men who have given the tax subject here and abroad profound and exhaustive study. If the conclusions of the tax committee, already quoted, were convincing, the reasons advanced by the following witnesses are conclusive:

"TESTIMONY OF TAX EXPERTS AGAINST A SALES TAX

"Arthur A. Ballantine, attorney at law, New York City, formerly Solicitor of Internal Revenue, says, page 32, hearings National Industrial Tax Committee:

"'I believe that this idea of a sales tax, a tax collected everywhere, falling on no one, is a will-o'-the-wisp which has floated over this field of taxation and which is in danger of luring business men who approach Congress in an effort to get really beneficial changes into futile action instead of constructive action.

"'I believe that this committee, by the very careful and exhaustive consideration which it has given to the advocates of this plan and its careful thought as to conclusions, has done much to dissipate this myth and to direct the efforts of business men into practical channels instead of down a pathway which leads to futility.'

"For the second witness I quote from Charles A. Andrews, whose frank, clear analysis of the sales tax is illuminating. He says (p. 38):

"'There was on the committee no vociferous objector to the sales tax. There was on the committee nobody who was loaded to kill it. We started in upon the assumption that we were going to work out something in the form of a sales tax. We invited various well-informed people to come before us. We reached out and got printed matter and manuscripts. We made investigations; and slowly but steadily the committee was driven to the inevitable conclusion that it, representing a large body of business men, could not bring before this conference a recommendation for any form of sales tax, except as the same related to a few specific articles, suggestions as to which we have made, and which have been referred to by Mr. Armitage.

"'We haven't the nerve, as good citizens of the country—which we believe we are, and are trying to be—to say to a body of business men in this country, who are suggesting that business be relieved from a billion dollars of excess-profits tax, that we propose a tax which will cause the billion to be paid by the ultimate consumer. That is such a violent divergence from the principle of payment upon the basis of ability to pay that we cannot ask this body of business men to get behind that sort of a tax.

"'We do not believe, in this day and generation—and following the World War instead of following the Napoleonic wars—that we have any business to propose seriously to the Congress of the United States a tax of a billion dollars, or two, or three (I don't know how much it would produce—all those figures are given), to be paid by the ultimate consumer, and organized business excused from its billion dollars of excess-profits tax.

"'We don't think that is good citizenship; and we don't think that is good economics. That is the real reason that we disposed of or rejected the sales tax, upon the assumption that the tax is paid by the ultimate consumer.

* * * * * * *

"'Well, let us assume that the tax all remained with the original payer of it, and that it is not passed on to the consumer. Does it then become a tax which we can justify ourselves in recommending to Congress? Your committee says "No." * * * Why? If the tax remains with the individual or concern which originally pays it, and he is not able to pass it on, it becomes a tax measured in terms, although not so stated, of his gross receipts; and as such, in the opinion of your committee, it is open to such serious objections that we cannot ask Congress to pass it. * * * A tax on gross receipts which leaves out of the equation all the difference in cost of the conduct of your business as compared to mine—perhaps it takes 90 percent of my gross receipts to conduct my business and pay my expenses; perhaps it takes 50 percent, or 70 percent, or 95 percent of yours—is an unjustifiable tax. * * * The establishment of a tax like that would, in the opinion of your committee, produce such inequalities that our dissatisfaction with the excess-profits tax would be as nothing, and we would find ourselves in the face of inequalities vastly greater than heretofore. * * * It is uneconomic in its nature; it is indefensible, in our opinion, in the twentieth century, if it is a general tax on all consumptions; and for other reasons it is equally indefensible if it becomes a tax in terms of gross receipts, which term means nothing so far as it relates to the ability to pay taxes.'

"Mr. Jules Bache, called as a hostile witness before that committee, gives his own concept of human nature and a cold-blooded alternative for the ultimate consumer who cannot pay the tax. He says, 'Quit consuming.' I quote from his statement before the industrial committee (p. 58):

"'Professor Adams this morning showed the greatest optimism that I have ever heard voiced from the tribune. He states that he believed the taxpayer was a cheerful, voluntary, honest man. That is not my opinion. The taxpayer—and I am not attacking his honesty when I say so—spends 11 months a year devising schemes by which, during the 1 month that he tries to make up his tax statement, he can avoid as many of the taxes as is legally possible, and he generally succeeds in avoiding many of them.

"'The idea of putting a thrift tax into our taxes, which the 20-percent limitation would be, is an excellent one, but the greatest thrift tax would be the turnover tax, since if anybody didn't want to pay any taxes he could merely refrain from consuming.'

"THE CANADIAN TAX IS NOT A SALES TAX

"W. C. Cornwell, an employee of Mr. Bache, read a statement of the Canadian sales tax at that same meeting—page 60—to which Robert G. Wilson, chief of the tax division, American Mining Congress, immediately replied, as follows:

"'I don't know how many gentlemen present are familiar with the Canadian law, but it has been my fortune within the last 3 or 4 years to spend some time in Canada, and for business reasons make some intensive study of the Canadian law. To my mind the Canadian law is not a sales tax.

"'In the first place, the law of July 1, known in the United States as a sales tax, is an amendment to the special war revenue act of 1915, which is an excise tax law.

"'What Mr. Cornwell has had to say regarding the Premier's statement is true. The statement, however, is misleading in that it refers to a sales tax, which in its effect exempts all the prime essentials of life from such taxes; it is only an addition at the rate of 1 percent and 2 percent to excise taxes—luxury taxes, if you please—which rise sometimes 50 percent upon many commodities—luxuries, essentials, and nonessentials. It is not, as the business men's tax committee has termed the proposition, a sales tax.'

"For the next witness I call Mr. J. F. Zoller, tax attorney of the General Electric Co. He says at the same committee hearings, page 62:

"'I want to talk just a minute on the sales tax. Now we have reached the parting of the ways here in regard to the sales tax. Personally, I am opposed to it for the reasons stated by Mr. Andrews. I can't state those objections any better or as well as he did. But the situation as I see it is this: The people who are favoring the sales tax are those who are already required to pay a sales tax under section 900 of the present law, and their position is that if the Government can select this industry and impose a sales tax upon us why not spread it to other taxpayers?'

"THE PHILIPPINE TAX DISCUSSED

"Replying to a statement filed by a Mr. Hord, formerly collector of internal revenue of the Philippines, the next witness, Mr. H. B. Fernald, of Loomis, Suffern & Fernald, New York, says, page 66:

"'The sales tax has been spoken of as if it were a new thing of very recent years. From my experience with the sales tax I go back to two things—one is the matter of the Philippine tax, the other the matter of the Mexican tax. * * * Do you want to place in your business a proposition where every purchaser is to get a receipt on which you are to affix serially numbered stamps, and where you have to account for all your stamps purchased and issued, subject to examination from time to time, to check up as to the number you have left and when you purchase them, and where you have to put down the last serial number you purchased and the serial number you are acquiring now?

"'My objection to the sales tax is particularly from this standpoint, and it is the same thing which will apply to almost any tax, namely, when a tax gets large in amount and it becomes worth while the taxpayer will look for a means to avoid it. * * * It can be eliminated; it can be gotten around. The experience in Mexico has shown that conclusively, and, therefore, it is a tax which will be paid by the small man, while the large man, who is able to change his business organization, can avoid it.'

"WHY ENGLAND REJECTS A SALES TAX

"The next witness is James J. Forstall, of Chicago, attorney at law and member of the tax committee, who speaks of efforts to pass a sales tax in Great Britain, the former home of Mr. Kahn. He says (p. 67):

"'Comment has been made on Canada and Mexico. I would like to say that 2 weeks ago yesterday, through the courtesy of Professor Haig, I had an opportunity to discuss with one of the members of the British income-tax commission and with one of the high tax officials of the British Government the question of the British taxation situation. As you probably all know, they have about as little love for the excess-profits duty as the Americans have for the excess-profits tax, and have been spending 2 years in trying to find a substitute, but they haven't yet found it. I asked each of those gentlemen whether the general sales tax has been considered as a substitute, and they both said the same thing: That it had been taken up and considered very seriously, but that now they were no longer considering it, because they were convinced that it was neither an equitable tax nor feasible from an administrative standpoint, nor one which could possibly be passed through Parliament.'

"For the next witness I quote from A. E. Holcombe, New York, secretary and treasurer of the National Tax Association. He says:

"'I happen to have with me a copy of a bulletin which is just about to come out, and in view of the references to other countries I thought I might read a couple of sentences from the report on the Mexican situation. It seems that early in the Carranza regime he established a committee to look into the entire financial system in Mexico. That committee made an elaborate report, and it has been reviewed by Professor Chandler, of Columbia, who spent some time himself as adviser.

"'It is perhaps not too much to say that the most important proposal to be found in the entire model plan (and that was the name given to this report) is that recommending the suppression of the sales tax throughout the States of Mexico. * * * It has always been a costly tax to collect, and according to the opinion of Mexican officials, who are in a position to know, it has constituted one of the most cumbersome impediments to industry and commerce.'

"HOW FARMERS REGARD A SALES TAX

"The next witness, J. R. Howard, of Chicago, speaks for a million and a half farmers in the American Farm Bureau Federation. He speaks the sentiments of several million other farmers not connected with the organization of which he is president. He says (p. 68):

"'The farmer is interested in paying his just and fair proportion of taxation. He believes every man, every citizen, should pay some tax, because it makes him a better citizen, but he believes that that taxation should be so distributed as to be fair and equitable, and in proportion to each man's ability to pay.

"'With regard to the sales tax, let me say that the farmer occupies a unique position. I think it has generally been conceded in this discussion that the tax is passed down to the ultimate consumer. The farmer can pass nothing to the ultimate consumer, because he buys at the other man's price and sells at the other man's price, and being at that disadvantage and not able to pass it on, he bears an unjust burden and is in a place where I am sure he, as a farmer, will object to the broad extension of the sales-tax principle.'

"Mr. H. C. McKenzie, of Walton, N.Y., a member of the tax committee, seconded Mr. Howard's testimony in vigorous language, as follows:

"'I want to take the opportunity to emphasize the farmer's objections to a general sales tax, which have been voiced by our president, Mr. Howard, and to call your attention to just two or three things briefly. * * * The chief proponent of the sales tax has told you that the excess-profits tax is not only paid by the ultimate consumer, but that the ultimate consumer pays the tax 2 or 3 times in amount. Now, if that is right, the corporations and people who are doing this business are receiving a benefit from the excess-profits tax, and the corporations and business people are the people who are asking for its repeal; they are asking for something that is diametrically opposed to their own interests. According to the chief proponents of the sales tax, the sales tax is paid by the ultimate consumer in its entirety; that is his proposition, as I understand it.

"'Now, your proposition, as developed by the advocates of the sales tax, is this: To take an approximate $1,000,000,000 off the excess-profits tax, which is not paid, as I contend, largely by the corporations, and put it over, according to the proponents of the sales tax, on the ultimate consumer. It seems to me that nothing could be more short-sighted and tend in the end to be a boomerang and to be a disadvantage not only to business but to capital, than to strive to shift the burden of a billion dollars from the business people who now pay it to the living wage—which is what it amounts to—the ultimate consumer. Ninety percent or ninety-five percent of that tax will be paid out of the living wage, if the contention of the proponents of the sales tax is correct; and I want to say that the farmers who are represented in the American Farm Bureau Federation will never in the world stand for that proposition.'

"'FARMERS WILL FIGHT TO THE END'

"Let me interject a witness at this point whose tenderness for wealth and capital has no conspicuous place in his published statement, from which I quote. I offer an extract from an article given to the press a few days ago by George P. Hampton, managing director of the Farmers National Council, an organization representing an enormous constituency. No one will doubt that equally forceful demands are voiced by the millions of organized and unorganized labor who are to be placed in the new class of turnover-sales taxpayers. Mr. Hampton says:

"'In 1918 [Mr. Hampton states] 22,696 millionaires were estimated by the eminent publicist, Mr. Richard Spillane, to own 27.2 percent of the national wealth, or over $68,000,000,000, while the 33 richest Americans owned property worth about $4,837,000,000, or, roughly, 2 percent of the national wealth. In 1918 the national wealth was estimated to be $250,000,000,000. It is now estimated to be $500,000,000,000. Our 23,000 millionaires are probably worth now about $136,000,000,000 and the 33 richest Americans about $9,675,000,000.

"'If we estimate the net return on this property at only 5 percent, the average income of those 23,000 millionaires is nearly $300,000. Of course, many of them have invested largely in tax-exempt bonds and own a considerable proportion of the $40,000,000,000 of such tax-exempt bonds. While a constitutional amendment would enable the Government to tax the income of these individuals, it will take some time to adopt such an amendment. A direct tax, however, could be levied upon capital values, and should be promptly levied by Congress instead of seeking some method of placing additional burdens of taxation through a retail sales tax, a general sales tax, and other consumption taxes upon the hundreds of thousands of families who today are receiving several hundreds of dollars less than they need to maintain the American standard of living. * * * A retail sales tax and other sales taxes and all similar taxes on food, clothing, and shelter, called consumption taxes, must be paid chiefly by the workers on the farms, in factories, mines, and transportation, millions of whom are getting less than the minimum wage necessary to maintain a family on a decent American standard.'

"Mr. Hampton concludes:

"'The full money cost of the war must be paid by taxes on incomes, corporation profits, estates, and privileges. Such taxes will yield $7,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000 a year for many years without imposing any hardship upon anyone. American farmers, who this year have lost billions through the slump in farm prices, will fight to the end the plan for the selfish privileged interests to saddle the huge war debt upon our people for years and insist upon prompt payment of that debt by those who profited so hugely by the war and by the monopolies built up in this country before and during the war.'

"A RECOGNIZED GREAT TAX AUTHORITY ON THE SALES TAX

"I could quote from many other witnesses who have not 'wobbled and wavered' for months, but the witnesses I have cited against the sales tax are tax students and authorities, men who have given the question thorough consideration in most cases, are apparently unprejudiced, and whose views are of great value in determining matters of taxation. One of the greatest international tax authorities, whose textbooks are known to every student of taxation, has expressed himself on the subject of a turnover sales tax as late as October 22 last. His contribution on the sales tax here and abroad is concise, fair, and positive. I quote from the statement of Dr. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University (national industrial tax committee hearings, p. 72):

"'The sales tax is not a novel tax, as the Premier of Canada said. If he has followed an academic course in taxation he could have learned of many examples, dating back as far as thousands of years ago. The Romans had it, not to speak of the Egyptians and the Babylonians. I do not want to give a lecture on taxation; I am simply trying to call attention to the fact that the sales tax has existed in one form or another for a great many years. With only two exceptions, it has been abolished everywhere and has not been reintroduced in any first-class country, and those two exceptions are Germany, which reintroduced it in 1919, and France, which, as has been said, introduced it in 1920. Now, before we consider the experiences with this tax, it must be remembered that we can learn little, one way or another, either for or against it from Mexico, or Cuba, or the Philippines, or Canada, all of which are countries of insignificant economic proportions, where we do not find the real kind of sales tax that we have been discussing today.'

"Again (p. 74):

"'The proposition now is to take off one of those three chief categories—the tax on excess profits—and remove the burden from profits on wealth or income and put it on the other or consumption side. This would, in my opinion, unduly shift the balance and bring us too near the position formerly occupied by all the aristocracies of old, and still reflected in some of the European countries. * * * (P. 75:) Why is it that England and America show their democracy, their real democracy, so much more than countries in the difficult position of Italy or France or Germany? There you will find throughout the war and even now the great mass of taxes imposed upon the consumption of the common man; whereas in England and in the United States during the Great War, as over against our experiences in the Civil War, the great majority of taxes are raised from wealth; that is, from those who can afford to pay, rather than from the consumption of the necessaries and comforts of life. * * * After the United States, the two countries of the world which are making the most progress in fiscal reform are England and Italy—for Italy is doing better than France. When these two countries came to consider this problem they went into the question of a sales tax thoroughly and finally rejected it. On the other hand, the two big countries of the world that have adopted the sales tax—Germany and France—did so only as a last resort, after exhausting every other available source of taxation. * * * Germany was forced to this sales tax in the last extremity, and in France the same is true. * * * I have been in California for 8 months and had the pleasure some time ago of addressing a large body of business men in San Francisco assembled to discuss this question. I found that the situation was precisely that which was presented by our committee. Everyone was anxious to get rid of the profits tax, everyone had heard that here was a way out, and it captivated them all; every man in that room was in favor of a general sales tax. But after I had talked with them, not so much in opposition as trying to show that there was another side of the question which they must begin to study, it was marvelous to see what a change came over them; not because I spoke—because everyone would have done just as well—but simply because attention was now called to some of the less obvious aspects of the case.

"'A sales tax on the sales of capital would ruin New York City as the financial center of the country. A sales tax on the necessaries of life would evoke a political struggle the like of which we have never seen in this country (p. 77).

"'The sales tax represents an attempt to put an undue, an extravagant burden upon the consumer, instead of on the producer or the possessor of wealth (p. 79).'

"Dr. Seligman discloses why Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and others of like antecedents from the 'aristocracies of old' favor a sales tax.

"I will willingly leave my colleagues in Congress to say whose advice is to be considered. Shall it be that of a man whose judgment is not warped by personal or pecuniary interests, who handles the subject with the mind of a master, whose opinion is supported by two great tax-investigating committees, by the experts of the Treasury, who have spoken through Secretary Houston and by a dozen reputable witnesses quoted? Whom shall we follow in placing a billion-dollar tax on the backs of the people? Shall we accept these authorities or shall it be the wabbler and waverer banker and broker with his New York colleague, who spends 11 months a year, according to his own admission, in trying to dodge taxes? There can be but one answer.

"LEST WE FORGET

"Mr. Chairman, a terrible war has swept over the world, leaving sorrow and misery strewn everywhere along the trail. The struggle with arms registered over a score of million men dead, wounded, or missing, but this was only one item of the losses. Social, industrial, and governmental upheavals have spread like a prairie fire from the war conflagration.

"In our own land innumerable battles have been fought, as bitter and lasting in effect as those occurring over 3,000 miles away. No statistics will ever record the broken homes, sicknesses, sacrifices, and deaths that have no place in history's battles nor of secret struggles when giving away millions of their best treasures—their boys. Nor will history ever properly record the taking of everything not nailed down during that war by profiteers who robbed the Government and robbed the public without limit or conscience. Scars are not yet healed, for the people have long memories.

"Fortunes have been amassed and laid away that were wrung from the necessities of our Nation and of the people. That is only one chapter from the record, but that is a chapter with which we are now concerned because profiteering and pilfering of the public has been a continuous performance whenever opportunity exists, and it is brought forcibly to mind by the proposal to repeal the excess profits law and enact a general sales tax.

"In a report from the Department of Labor of January 26, just issued, the statement is made that 3,473,466 jobs have been lost within the past year and industry has been reduced approximately 40 percent. In the face of this record Congress is now asked to exempt from taxation those who accumulated enormous profits in great corporate business and also to slash deep the surtaxes of those whose individual incomes reach high levels. According to Bache, who heads the sales-tax propagandists, these taxes now paid out of large profits and high incomes should be shifted on to the three and a half million jobless, who with their dependents must buy food, heat, and clothes, with an alternative, according to Bache, expressed with grim humor, 'to merely refrain from consuming' (p. 58).

"That advice is more cruel than Marie Antoinette's, 'If they can't get bread, why not eat cake?' Bache has many disciples in this country and in the world today, but only the blind fail to see that an autocracy of wealth may become the handmaid of a military autocracy which the world has temporarily destroyed.

"Those who try to view conditions without bitterness or prejudice find the greatest danger to our body politic today lies in the ruthless crushing of the individual, the cupidity and selfishness of men, and a modern-day arrogance of wealth, that in turn demands its protection from those whom it crushes.

"In this day of world-wide commercial struggles, when the individual becomes swallowed up in the maelstrom, it is well to remember that under our form of government the humblest and poorest is entitled to equal rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, unless it is to become a lost paragraph from our Constitution, and that next to liberty the most frequent cause for historic struggles has come from unjust taxation, with its accompanying oppression.

"OTHER TAX ISSUES NOT DISCUSSED

"I have presented what I believe to be facts and authorities that effectually discredit the present effort to saddle a turnover sales tax on the people of this country. One of the greatest campaigns for the tax is now being waged in Washington and throughout the country. The stakes are higher than with any legislative program in recent years because the plan proposes to shift the $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 in excess-profits taxes over on to the underfellow.

"Money is plentifully supplied to press this propaganda upon Congress. Every man who pays excess-profits taxes in Congress will be pressed to join the movement, irrespective of economic, governmental, or political results. I have not sought to discuss the repeal of excess-profits taxes nor the proper limit to place on personal income surtaxes. Nor have I assumed to discuss a constitutional amendment that will reach the hoarded wealth of Jules Semon Bache and others who invest their wealth in tax-exempt securities.

"I have not presented the alternative of taxing capital now being pressed in other countries, notably England, and by large farming organizations and some labor organizations in our own country, nor have I dwelt on the fact that while England refuses to give up her excess-profits tax and rejects a sales tax without any consideration, special interests most concerned here, following the example of the railway-bill propaganda of last year, are straining every nerve to do here what England dare not do across the water, and I use the term 'dare not' advisedly.

"THE PRICE IS TOO GREAT TO PAY

"I have not discussed the political liability of a turnover consumption tax, nor have I indulged in useless predictions of what reward will be measured out to Representatives who listen to the siren song of the propagandists and fail to represent those back home, those who will be called on to pay the bill—a billion-dollar tax bill—in addition to other taxes, local and Federal. These are the fruitful fields for discussion and may be covered before any turnover consumption tax is passed by Congress. I have tried to place before you the judgment of recognized experts, expressed both individually and through united action, all of whom condemn the passage of a general sales tax in this country in time of peace. Their views have not been given to Congress in any public hearings, to my knowledge, although sales-tax advocates, led by an amateur expert who wobbles and wavers, have been given full hearings by our committee with accompanying wide publicity through the press.

"To my own mind, the time is one of great concern. The future does not rest alone on the resumption of business but also on the willingness of men of large means to shoulder their full share of governmental and tax burdens. Temporary success of any sales-tax measure will be at the expense of respect for property and of those who succeed.

"The price is too great, and one that even those drunk with power may well hesitate to pay."

I have made the assertion that powerful agencies are now waiting for the action of Congress in order to help them avoid an income tax. This statement is supported by cumulative testimony furnished by witnesses who were quoted in my speech of April 14, 1921, when the last sales tax was being pressed in the House for passage. I then said:

"INVESTIGATE THE SALES-TAX LOBBY

"'In every congressional district in the country' a campaign is being waged by the sales-tax lobby to shift an excess-profits tax on corporations reaching nearly $800,000 annually to a sales tax on everything the people eat, drink, and wear. An investigation is demanded of the slush fund thus raised and of methods used by the lobby.

"Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on a subject which is closely connected with that which we are discussing today, and yet is not the emergency tariff bill. I would that others more capable could have undertaken it, but I do not believe I have any right to remain silent in view of conditions that should be disclosed to the House at this time.

"There is an element, not in the House particularly, but in the country, that is insisting on a tax on everything we eat, drink, or wear through a sales tax, and effort is being made to put that through at this time. I want to discuss that proposal briefly.

"Let me say, first, that the National Industrial Conference Board, which represents millions of dollars in capitalization and represents millions of men in its employ, has reported, through its committee, against this tax. The United States Chamber of Commerce Tax Committee, similarly constituted, representing all of the chambers of the United States, has reported against that tax, and so has the National Credit Men's Association. What do you suppose would be the verdict if it was submitted to the millions and millions of farmers and men working in the factories and shops today, as well as the clerks and others, if they were to decide upon paying the tax that is to be shifted from the excess profits? That is the proposition proposed at this time.

"Now, I have today on my desk 145 letters received from candy-makers alone demanding a sales tax. I have between 500 and 600 from jewelers, from druggists, from various classes of people who want to have the tax shifted from them over on the backs of the people of the country, and therefore demand a sales tax. We have newspapers and pamphlets galore for a sales tax. Let me read to you from some of them so that you will understand the extent of the propaganda.

"Here is a full-page advertisement headed 'The Bubble Has Burst.' It is from the Wall Street Journal that editorially has criticized me severely for the position I have taken against a sales tax. I want to call your attention to the words of this full-page advertisement. And I understand it was carried in other papers throughout the country.

"On page 7 of the Wall Street Journal of March 17, 1921, it says:

"'M. Francois-Marsal, the banker finance minister, is credited with having discovered a veritable philosopher's stone in the new tax on turnover. The yield is already proving unexpectedly satisfactory, and there appears to be every reason that it will produce a much greater amount than had been anticipated in the Budget estimates.'

"As a matter of fact, every intelligent man familiar with the French sales tax—and the man who wrote that is intelligent—knows that only 37 percent of sales-tax estimates is being collected in France.

"If France is unsuccessful, how can we hope for different results? In France the budget estimates of 487,000,000 and 413,000,000 francs for January and February fell down to 187,000,000 and 151,000,000 for those months as stated, or to 37 percent of estimates, and are dropping proportionately every month. In the April monthly letter Hamilton Institute, I quote a French cable:

"'The yield of the French business turnover tax, which became effective July 1, 1920, has proved decidedly disappointing. * * * The measure has proved cumbersome and unpopular. * * * In each month so far the proceeds have been less than those of the preceding month.'

"The 'letter' further says:

"'The Government cannot cope with the present crisis unless payments on the indemnity are soon forthcoming. * * * France has been less progressive in her tax legislation than England and the United States. She depends less upon the taxation of individuals and corporation incomes and more upon sales taxes and other obsolete methods of collecting revenue.'

"In cable March 27 (Washington Post) it says of the French economic crisis:

"'This, it is asserted here, is not due to overproduction, but instead to willful underconsumption as a result of prevailing high prices, which are likely to continue.'

"HIGH PRICES, UNDER-CONSUMPTION, AND DISTRESS FOLLOW THE SALES TAX

"The above contains a clean-cut survey of the experience of the only large country which has adopted a turnover sales tax.

"The Philippine sales tax offers no solution. Receipts in 1919 were $6,865,624 (₱13,731,248) and in 1920 $7,521,000 (₱15,042,000), collected from 10,500,000 people, or about 75 cents per capita. That rate is 1 percent. (Sec. 1459 P.I.)

"The Smoot rate of 1 percent would bring 75 cents per capita, or about $75,000,000, in this country at same proportionate consumption. It is useless to speculate how much more we would consume. These are the figures. As well compare a skiff on a mill pond or on a large lake subject to heavy winds and waves as to compare the Philippines with a nominal budget and ours with $4,000,000,000 annually.

"Canada's sales tax is not a sales tax and has proven a notorious revenue disappointment, filled with exemptions, administered by a body possessing practically legislative functions, to change or add further exemptions.

"Mr. McCoy, the Treasury expert, I am informed, estimated $185,000,000 annually on our luxury taxes, whereas only about $50,000,000 has been collected, or less than one third of the estimates. This is a final sales tax and speaks for itself.

"Here is the San Francisco Chronicle; I have no criticism, but it publishes a full-page advertisement on the sales tax by the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Baltimore. It was also published here in the city of Washington, and presumably published generally throughout the United States. Who pays the enormous amount of money to finance this one advertisement, and what was the purpose? The public is entitled to know. Who pays for the lobby that is to be established here in Washington? Who is paying for all this large expenditure of money, and who is instigating the work?

"I have here an original letter from one of the men who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means. His name is Jules S. Bache, of New York City. His letter is dated March 28, 2 weeks ago. It went all over the country. Thousands of copies, I understand, have been circulated among financial interests that, in the aggregate, have $1,000,000,000 annual excess-profits tax and income tax at stake that is to be shifted to a sales tax:

"[President, Hazen J. Burten, Minneapolis, president Plymouth Clothing House; executive vice president, Henry G. Opdycke, New York; treasurer, Jules S. Bache, J. S. Bache & Co., members New York Stock Exchange]

"THE TAX LEAGUE OF AMERICA, INC., TO LIFT THE BURDEN OF UNWISE TAXATION,
"NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS, 1270 BROADWAY,
"New York City, March 28, 1921.

"DEAR SIR: It is stated that business men in this country are paying out in fees for expert services in the preparation of their income-tax returns about $100,000,000 annually. * * *

"The Government does not receive any part of this vast sum, nor does it receive the hundreds of millions which for one reason or another are never collected under the present inadequate and bunglesome tax system.

"To simplify and improve the present system a tax on all gross sales is proposed. Such a tax is easily collected, and this is a big thing in its favor. Clearly a sales tax would be inexpensive in its operation and no burden to anyone, and would fairly and equitably spread the obligation of Government expense to all in the fair and just proportion each should bear. Moreover, it will be simple in operation and will return a sufficient revenue.

"I am writing to you because men like you and me may, as well as anyone else, take up the fight for an adequate taxing system. It is our job, since it is our money which is now being taken inequitably from us under a system which constitutes, undoubtedly the greatest blight upon legitimate business initiative now existing.

"I ask your cooperation in a plan now organizing to conduct an educational campaign in favor of a general sales or turnover tax throughout the country.

"For this purpose the Tax League of America has been created, and has already done work which is showing results. Will you, therefore, please send your check for $50, payable to Jules S. Bache, treasurer, and mail same to the Tax League of America, Inc., 1270 Broadway, New York City?

"Yours very truly,

"JULES S. BACHE.

"(First vice president, John Williams, New York, vice president Irving National Bank.)"

"Mr. Bache, from his testimony before our committee, has presumably contributed 20 or 50 times $50. His taxes make the stake worth while.

"How many thousands of these letters are being circulated throughout the country, and what is to be done with the enormous sum of money which will be raised? Mr. Bache was before our committee. He stated he is investing as fast as possible all his money in municipal bonds in order to escape taxation. He stated to the industrial tax committee that the average man spends 11 months of the year trying to legally evade his taxes. He said at the same time the way to escape consumption taxation under his proposition is not to consume. This is the gentleman who is going to crack the whip over the Congress of the United States. His lobby will be working full force in a few days, and then we will be given the benefit of his many publicity agencies in earnest.

"From the New York Times, several days ago, I quote:

"'Plans for uniting individuals and trade associations who favor a general sales tax in support of a measure now being drawn (the Smoot bill) for presentation before Congress have been made by the Tax League of America, Inc. (Julius Bache), whose headquarters are at 1270 Broadway. The program includes a "campaign of education" in every congressional district in the country.'

"The article continues in an extended statement of what Mr. Bache and his aides proposes to do with the new organization.

"Let me read you another statement. This comes from Mr. Meyer Rothschild, who was before our committee. This letter is signed by Mr. N. R. Fuller and pays a high compliment to Mr. Rothschild:

"'NATIONAL WHOLESALE JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION URGES MEMBERS TO SUPPORT JEWELERS' WAR REVENUE TAX COMMITTEE

"'The following letter to members was sent out on March 2 by the National Wholesale Jewelers' Association, urging support of the fight on taxation being led by Mr. Rothschild's special committee:

"'This letter is written to emphasize and call your attention to the necessity of actively supporting—morally, financially, and physically—the work of the jewelers' war revenue tax committee, which is being so capably guided by its chairman, Meyer D. Rothschild.

"'As you already know, this committee and the entire jewelry industry are fighting not only to prevent an additional tax being placed on jewelry but to remove altogether the excise tax on our industry and work for the adoption of a turnover sales tax in lieu of our present inequitable tax system.

"'The points regarding this proposition are too well known to need further discussion, but I do want to emphasize the necessity for ample finances for this committee to use in prosecuting their work effectively and without embarrassment.

"'The present plan for financing the work of the jewelry war revenue tax committee is to select 28 of the leading cities and estimate on a percentage basis what was thought each city ought to raise.

"'A letter has been addressed to you or someone in your city requesting that the quota for your city or district be promptly raised. Experience has shown that unless these matters are followed up and "put across" by someone of ability and initiative the work is never done.

"'Trusting that each member of our association will take it upon himself to be a committee of one to see that Mr. Rothschild and his committee has the financial and active support this cause would justify and with kindest regards, I am,

"'Yours very truly,

"'NOBLE R. FULLER, President.

"'KEYSTONE, April 1921.

"'N.B.—The treasurer of the jewelers' war revenue committee is A. L. Brown, 68 Nassau Street, New York, to whom checks may be sent or communications directed.'

"From the same publication I quote:

"'Let all your friends and neighbors in these lines know what you are doing, and suggest that they also see their Congressmen and Senators while they are at home and talk to them on this important subject.

"'If you cannot see your Congressman, write to him, and again to your Senators, unless you have had replies to your last letter.

"'Please let us know the result of your interviews, and do what you can to get your friends outside of the jewelry trade, who are taxed under title IX, to work along the same lines.

"'You must work quickly, as the special session of Congress will probably be called for April 4.

"'We are looking forward to your usual loyal cooperation, and hope to hear from you shortly.

"'JEWELERS' WAR REVENUE TAX COMMITTEE,

"'MEYER D. ROTHSCHILD, Chairman.'

"35,000 JEWELERS' LETTERS $27,000

"I quote from page 91 of the Jewelers' Circular, April 13, 1921, a public statement of Chairman Larter, of the 'Jewelers' Vigilance Committee', known as 'the governor of the jewelry industry.' He said:

"'Do you know that the jewelers' vigilance committee has paid the jewelry trade's share of the expenses of the business men's tax committee, and this amount up to date for tax matters is in excess of $27,000? About the 1st of January we sent over 35,000 letters to every jeweler in the United States, asking them to write their Congressmen and Senators in favor of the turnover sales tax and to send us contributions. Recently we selected 26 cities in the United States and prorated the amount we thought each city should contribute.'

"Candy men, jewelers, retailers, druggists, stockbrokers, newspapers are all on the job.

"Here they are dividing the United States up into 26 districts to get money in behalf of their organization to help put over the sales tax. I received yesterday a New York paper in which it says some New York man claiming to represent the traveling salesmen says of the sales-tax opposition:

"'That a powerful group of large tax accountants and experts were banded together to defeat the sales tax because it would wipe out the need of their services, for which $100,000,000 a year is now paid.'

"This sounds so much like Mr. Bache's letter that further comment as to its source is unnecessary. They are trying to find the $100,000,000 accountants, and we ought to have them testify where they exist. Let us have the facts.

"Many editorials and news items are being received supporting a sales tax. What will the effect of the excess-profits tax be on the newspapers, the great newspapers, the powerful newspapers of the country? I do not criticize them, but I am speaking of their interests in the subject, for the interest of every witness should be known to the jury. What is the effect of a profits tax on the great newspapers, what do they now pay, and what will be the effect of a sales tax and what difference will it make when advertising contracts go free? We understand the tremendous power they exercise today. They have a right to protect their interests, but what are those interests? Both of these gentlemen—Mr. Bache and Mr. Rothschild—speak of the educational campaigns they are now carrying on in all congressional districts. That same kind of education was carried on by a notorious body of New Yorkers known as the 'National Security League.' We made an investigation of that organization in Congress. What was the result? A discovery of $600,000 or more for an educational fund which was used as a slush fund to aid in the defeat of Members of Congress.

"What part of this Bache and Rothschild fund is a slush fund?

"One of the leading men on the Democratic side, a man of high character, stated to me that the amount of the sales-tax contributions would be a million dollars. That was at the close of the last session, before he knew of the many agencies and funds and lobbies that are being organized.

"The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Reavis). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

"Mr. FREAR. May I have 15 additional minutes?

"Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman may have additional time.

"Mr. YOUNG. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

"Mr. FREAR. I am asking for an investigation in order to stop this tremendous propaganda, or in order to permit Members of Congress to decide these questions upon their own merits and not upon the representations of men who are demanding we shift a billion dollars in taxes from them over to the backs of the 100,000,000 who cannot escape. I have received probably 600 letters demanding a sales tax. How many have you Members received? All the letters received from this propaganda are on one side, practically, with not 10 letters to the contrary, whereas the sentiment of the country is just the reverse. One million men want to escape excess-profits taxes and are trying to shift their taxes onto the remaining 105,000,000 through a sales tax. To pyramid the costs of living for every man with a family of five to from $100 to $200 or more annually. What will these people say if we pass a sales tax?

"I have here a letter received last night from my home city, sent out by the Rothschild organization. It says there there is going to be raised $4,000,000,000 by the 1-percent sales tax. What a dishonest and false statement to make. Every district is to be flooded with letters, my friends, and I ask for an investigation. I do not think Congress ought to sit mute when these matters are pressed upon the country by irresponsible 'incorporated' concerns, and that is a reason why there should be an investigation.

"I am not going to discuss the sales tax now. I did so in my speech of January 31. I want you to understand the propaganda on this revenue sales tax bill financed by the man who has the money, the excess profits, and who is trying to shove his taxes onto the poor people of the country. He should pay according to his ability to pay, a principle that has stood for generations and is supported by the organizations quoted against a sales tax. The best tax experts in the country insist on that principle. Why not? Why should every dollar's worth of necessities a poor man buys, his coffee and tea and sugar and clothes, be taxed to relieve the men who will pay nearly a billion dollars in excess-profits taxes in 1921 after deducting their $3,000 exemption and 8 percent on their invested capital, which is now exempt? The United States Steel Corporation the other day reported that it made 43 percent more in 1920 than it made in 1919, or $109,000,000 profit. Texas Oil the other day reported a profit of $85,000,000, and it made 56 percent more in 1920 than in 1919. Are you going to relieve those people from that excess-profits tax? I cannot believe it possible, unless some equally just tax is to be substituted.

"I have here an editorial from the Wall Street Journal, of over a column, criticizing me because I made a speech here against the sales tax on January 31.

"I delivered the speech and sent it out, because I am thoroughly opposed to a turnover sales tax to run the Government. I wish other Members who are better able to do so would undertake the task of presenting opposition, because it calls for action and because, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good] said on this floor, 'Any party that undertakes to put a sales tax through will be defeated the next time at the polls.' I fear he is right. The editorial was unjust, made many misstatements, and failed to mention facts that could not have escaped the attention of any fair-minded writer. My answer says:

"'APRIL 14, 1921.

"'New York City, N.Y.

"'MY DEAR SIR: Your column editorial in the Wall Street Journal of April 5 is received, wherein I am chastised editorially by B. S. Orcutt because in my speech of January 31 I opposed a sales tax and because I recently stated: "All sales-tax people desire to force that tax on the people before it can fully be understood." That statement I repeat, while the Journal confesses its truth and avoids by saying an "educational" propaganda demanding a sales tax is now on. A strong tax propaganda has been on for months, although it misrepresents, misstates, and theorizes without basis or reason. Members have been deluged with sales-tax letters urging a discredited tax, generally abandoned centuries ago by civilized governments. I have received 500 letters, including 145 from candy makers alone, all demanding to be exempted from taxes they now pay and also demanding that Congress substitute a sales tax. This kind of "education" is admitted.

"'A powerful lobby with an enormous slush fund is planned in Washington to push the sales tax through Congress.

"'Is that the "educational" medium to which you refer? Highly paid publicity men and men who crack the whip in Wall Street are about to crack their whips over Congress, according to this propaganda, in an effort to shift $1,000,000,000 in taxes they now pay annually over to the backs of the hundred million men, women, and children of the country who consume. These millions have no lobby, but they are to be sales-taxed over a billion dollars on everything they eat, drink, and wear, so that Wall Street profits may go untaxed or may be undertaxed. This lobby includes scores of men now taxed who are expected to appear before the Senate committee to voice their woes, while the sales-tax lobby is as boastful and brutal as the National Security League of like membership and fame, that blew up when its $600,000 "educational" slush fund and Wall Street methods were exposed by Congress.

"'The Wall Street Journal is recognized as a leader in this present sales-tax propaganda, for apart from its editorials the Journal printed a full-page "advertisement" on March 17, page 7, demanding a sales tax—

"'I referred to a page advertisement in the Wall Street Journal that favored a sales tax—

"'Therein this advertisement said of the recently enacted French sales tax: "The yield is already proving unexpectedly satisfactory and there appears to be every reason that it will produce a much greater amount than had been anticipated in the budget estimates."

"'The Wall Street Journal carried that false statement throughout the country on March 17, although long prior to that date the New York press printed the fact that French budget estimates of January and February 1921 were 487,000,000 francs and 413,000,000 francs, respectively, yet the actual receipts by the French Government for the same months had only been 187,000,000 francs and 151,000,000 francs, in round numbers, or a little over one third of the estimates. At present values this reached only $11,000,000 monthly for France, or less than 10 percent of what is predicted here. In other words, the Journal was 63 percent wrong on the most important statement in its full-page advertisement of March 17.

"'No greater injustice could be done Congress than to send broadcast this glaring misstatement of the most important fact on which a sales tax law was to be based. Was it a mistake on your part?

"'Your Orcutt editorial of April 5 pretends to explain why a packed sales-tax crowd led by Bache and Rothschild, tax leaders, failed to capture a meeting of the National Industrial Tax Conference which had previously denounced a sales tax.

"'The National Industrial Conference Tax Committee represented thousands of great industries, billions of dollars in the aggregate, and millions of laboring men employed, whereas Bache and Rothschild are New York stockbrokers or jewelers. That committee squarely rejected the sales tax. Its authority was limited to its report, but you complain because a handful of Wall Street tax dodgers failed to capture the meeting. That is the burden of your editorial. Three members there present state your editorial criticism is a misstatement of fact.'

"Three members of that committee in my office all said that I had stated the facts correctly in the speech of January 31, and that there was no correction they had to make. And let me say this, that all men of great means are not in favor of a sales tax. Mr. R. P. Hazzard, who is at the head of the Hazzard Shoe Co., said in my office two or three days ago, 'Mr. FREAR, it would be $200,000 more a year interest to me to have the sales-tax provision passed, and yet I have been opposing it at every place I could, speaking against it constantly.' Mr. Hazzard realizes, as he says, not only the injustice of putting this enormous tax burden upon the shoulders of the people, but beyond that comes the question of destroying many small companies that compete with his big company and other integrated concerns where he and they would have a great advantage through a turnover sales tax.

"I am continuing to read from my letter to the Wall Street Journal:

"'Your deliberate purpose to mislead and deceive is again emphasized. The contributor of your editorial, Mr. Orcutt, had an intimate knowledge of the tax meeting referred to and of my speech. That you admit. He knew that I quoted in my speech of January 31 at length from official reports of two important committees, the national industrial tax committee and the United States Chamber of Commerce tax committee. Both committees repudiated any sales tax. Why did you not state in your editorial that the tax committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, representing hundreds of thousands of business men of the country, not only reported unqualifiedly against any sales tax, but on February 21 reported on a referendum to the chambers of America, which was widely published in the press? Why did you not state that in this referendum 1,221½ votes favored an excise tax but opposed its imposition on articles of first necessity, with only 504½ votes opposed, contrary to the Journal's position? On the referendum of, "Should a sales tax be substituted for an excess-profits tax and excise tax?" the vote was 706½ for and 857½ against, or a majority of 151 unit votes against. On the referendum of, "Should a sales tax be levied in addition to excess profits and excise?" the vote was 767½ for and 894½ against, or 127 majority unit votes against. Why did you not give the facts where hundreds of thousands of business men were represented, as by these organizations, distinguished from a handful of Wall Street sales-tax boosters, whose money and publicity is their capital in trade?

"'What more significant evidence of deliberate concealment of facts and of misstatement could be afforded than your unfair reference to one committee and concealment of the other? What effect does the excess-profits tax have on the advertising profits of your paper and of all the other large papers? Will you escape many thousands of dollars tax annually under a general sales tax law?'

"'ONE HUNDRED MILLION PEOPLE AGAINST A SALES TAX

"'What do you honestly believe, Mr. Editor, is the sentiment of the 10,000,000 farmers and an equal number of laborers on whose backs the Wall Street Journal and its bulls and bears are trying to shift a billion-dollar tax burden now paid by the rich out of their profits? What is the sentiment of the millions upon millions of women and children who have no powerful lobby, no Wall Street Journal, no great slush fund, and no wide propaganda, but who confidently depend on Congress to protect them now and always? Is their opinion to be ignored?

"'What answer do you make, Mr. Editor, to the statement of Chairman Good, of the Appropriations Committee of the House, that "a sales tax is a tax on the backs and bellies of the people, and any party passing such a law is certain to go down to defeat"? Yet you approve that iniquitous tax.

"'The country knows those you represent are less than 5 percent of the American people, men whose politics and principles are measured by personal interest or by the dollar mark, and many of them regard millions of jobless and of God's patient poor with unconcern or worse. Business interests such as you represent sent a great political party down to defeat 8 years ago by use of money and the same tactics you now pursue.

"'Do you not believe men responsible for placing a sales-tax burden on the people will be remembered for their action, even as those who burdened the people with the 1909 tariff bill, and do you not believe this effort of greed and extortion on the part of those who have profiteered in the past and who now lead the sales-tax effort in putting screws on the people is unjust?

"'Do you believe it is fair for the Journal to open on a humble Member of Congress with over a column editorial of misstatement and concealment in a cuttlefish effort to obscure the issue? If you do not—and I assume you have an element of fairness that the advertising pages affected by existing excess profits tax laws cannot control—will you please give publicity to this needed correction of your editorial equal to that given your manifestly untrue editorial of April 5?

"'Very truly yours,

"'JAMES A. FREAR.'

"Mr. Chairman, the other day I sent to the Members of the House my speech of January 31. I did it simply because you, like myself, have received some 600 letters with little to the contrary. All I wish to do is to bring this before your attention, and as long as I sit in Congress I shall try to bring to your attention propaganda presented only on the one side when the people back home have had no voice on the other side. No case as flagrant has occurred in years as this sales-tax lobby and sales-tax propaganda.

"Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the excess-profits tax is to be repealed, what is the gentleman's idea as to how revenue shall be raised?

"Mr. FREAR. One way in part is the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Longworth], which is a good one, supported by Mr. Houston, of the Treasury Department, to put 6 percent additional to the 10 percent on the net profits of corporations, which will raise about $450,000,000 according to their estimates. Rather than have a sales tax, I am willing to accept practically anything. Next, we might put a tax on undistributed profits, if necessary, which will raise about $190,000,000 by the tax proper, according to Treasury estimates, and would realize about $400,000,000 more, according to the statement of the Treasury experts at that time, or nearly $600,000,000 or over a billion dollars by those two items of revenue alone, in addition to nearly a billion dollars excess under present revenues for 1921, according to estimates.

"Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman recalls the statement in the President's message the other day that you gentlemen were committed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

"Mr. FREAR. I heard the President's statement. I have no issue to join with him. I do not care to have any political issue raised about this. Let me say this, if you gentlemen are sincere and honest in this thing, regarding your opposition to a sales tax, come and help us now to let Congress and the country know what efforts are being made to put through a sales tax. Do not wait until we do something on this side of the aisle and then complain about it. Why did you not pass a resolution against a sales tax yesterday in your caucus? Then was the time to help those of us who feel the same way about it, for I know many of you are opposed to that kind of a tax.

"Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

"Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman favor the taxes he has just suggested instead of the excess-profits tax?

"Mr. FREAR. I would favor any of them by far in preference to a sales tax.

"Mr. GARNER. I did not ask the gentleman that. I ask the gentleman personally whether he favors those taxes that he has enumerated instead of the excess-profits tax?

"Mr. FREAR. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that, because the experts in the Treasury Department say there is no tax more fair than the excess-profits tax. I believe the men who are able to pay the taxes should pay them, and there is no one better able to pay than those who make excess profits.

"Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

"Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman think there is any serious danger of his party imposing a sales tax as a revenue scheme?

"Mr. FREAR. Oh, I wish I could tell the gentleman some things that I believe but do not know and that I cannot speak of here. [Laughter.] Let me say that they are not of a political character, but I do know the situation, and the serious menace of a sales tax, and you know what is being done as well as I do in regard to it, because I have laid before you some of the data in my possession.

"Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me suggest that a very large portion of the amount that would be lost by the repeal of the excess-profits tax will be raised at the customhouse under a bill which I trust will be shortly reported to the House.

"Mr. FREAR. A good suggestion coming from the gentleman from Ohio—300 millions is an item of additional income which will be received from the customhouse under the new tariff bill, according to Treasury estimates. We also have proposals that will raise about $2,500,000,000, so no possible excuse exists, in my judgment, for putting through a sales tax. I thank you." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have submitted with these remarks some observations on a turn over sales tax that is not particularly involved in the bill before us, but it discloses from the lips of able tax experts that a manufacturers' tax which enables the manufacturer, jobber, wholesaler, and retailer to take his profits and a little extra, if need be, is equally objectionable when it fastens the tax upon the necessities of the consumer, rich and poor alike, with certainty that the poor will pay far more proportionately than his rich neighbor, who is endeavoring to eventually secure a sales tax as a substitute for the present income tax.

The income tax law was only obtained by constant struggles by the people. It was first defeated by a Supreme Court decision of 5 to 4 that attempted, with assumed constitutional authority, to prevent the imposition of an income tax. The minority opinion of four members of the Court was so conclusive in character that Congress immediately offered a constitutional amendment to secure amplified power under the Constitution to pass another income tax law. Based upon that amendment and law, again the tremendous pressure by great financial organizations was felt, and the Court divided again 5 to 4 on the stock-dividend decision, which emasculated the law and, in effect, has weakened the income-tax provision of the Constitution.

All this is familiar history to tax students, but it has a bearing to show the tremendous power which is now being exercised by these same wealthy individuals and interests that have failed permanently to prevent the income tax being levied upon them and who now seek to substitute a sales tax on the theory that 2¼ percent tax is so small that it will not create opposition, but the camel's nose under the tent will be pressed to a much higher extent, either by a larger rate, like the 6-percent manufacturers' tax rate now in Australia, or by a turnover-sales tax, if it can be successfully pressed on Congress as heretofore attempted.

Let me say frankly that is the avowed purpose of those now urging the tax, but I am sure it is in no way chargeable to some of those who are defending it at the present time. They have been captured by the pleasing cry of balancing the Budget, and instead of placing taxes where they belong—upon those best able to pay—they are flirting with a tax that once accepted and placed in the statute will be a Sindbad burden, only to be unloaded by some general revulsion of sentiment, political or otherwise, throughout the country.

On March 14 this week, I sent a letter to my colleagues of the House, of which the following is a copy:

"CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D.C., March 14, 1932.

"DEAR COLLEAGUE: Do we want a sales tax? A head tax or poll tax in its effect, it discards the principle of comparative income or ability to pay, but taxes consumption. In the RECORD of Friday, March 11 last, pages 6018 to 6036, is found quoted nearly a score of eminent tax experts and farm and labor organizations in this country and in Canada in opposition to a sales tax, taken from a former speech. Although then urged by the Treasury, that tax was defeated by the House committee—and other tax sources found.

"Vigorous opposition was expressed by these witnesses against alleged efforts to substitute a sales tax for income and other taxes. Arguments against the tax by labor and farm organizations and all others in 1921, apply especially in these days of business depression and unemployment when the people are demanding bread for relief instead of a stone.

"None of these witnesses apparently was heard in the recent committee hearings. A manufacturers' tax with profits of jobbers, wholesalers, and retailers is usually passed on to the consumer. Ex-Senator Hardwick, Georgia, testified in 1920 before the committee that such increase, in cases cited, might reach 100 percent over the original sales price. Witnesses in opposition to a sales tax will also be found in my speeches of January 31, December 21, and April 14, all in 1921, and February 21 in 1922.

"The Canadian sales tax produced $38,000,000 in 1920–21, $100,000,000 in 1923–24, and only $20,000,000 in 1930–31 (hearings, p. 249). Change in character and rates should be studied, when England, though badly depressed, has steadily refused to follow her two colonies with this unjust tax that carries a rate of 4 percent in Canada and 6 percent in Australia, rates later to be urged on Congress by strong influences.

"No substitute taxes need be suggested. The gift tax on $50,000 is only started at 1½ percent. The estate tax should not remit 80 percent for State credits. Increased tax is justified on cigarettes, now costing three times as much in Canada (hearings, p. 246). Tax on gasoline of 1 cent and on car and truck sales, with other items, will be more just to 95 percent of America's consumers than a sales tax.

"If, as predicted by the press, this $600,000,000 consumption tax remains in the House bill, the Senate may substitute some other tax for one which England rejects and all tax experts I have quoted declare is against correct principles of taxation—a tax on necessities that will increase the prevailing distress and discontent.

"Very truly yours,

"JAMES A. FREAR."

Mr. Speaker, although the time is too limited to obtain any extended statements from organizations that militantly opposed the sales tax when last sought to be fastened upon consumers, I offer the opinion of leading officials of the American Federation of Labor appearing in the following statement:

"[From the American Federation of Labor official information service]

"William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, issued the following statement today regarding the proposed sales tax now being considered by Congress:

"'The sales-tax provision of the pending taxation legislation is strongly opposed by the American Federation of Labor. This position of the American Federation of Labor is based upon its traditional opposition to all forms of sales-tax legislation. Whatever argument is offered in support of sales-tax legislation during periods of reasonable prosperity cannot apply now. The existing economic situation adds to the strength of argument against the imposition of such a character of taxation. The sales tax would fall more heavily upon the masses of the people who are now suffering from unemployment than upon any other group of our citizenship. To add a sales tax to the reductions of wages which have been imposed upon wage earners during the last year would mean addition to the misery, woe, and want which now prevail throughout the land.

"'How can men and women who are unable to buy the bare necessities of life be expected to pay a sales tax upon the limited merchandise which they are able to buy? This proposed manufacturers' sales tax will affect the sale of clothes, shoes, and a large percentage of foodstuffs. To impose this sales tax upon these necessities of life would mean that the masses, who are now purchasing only a limited amount, would be compelled to buy still less. It is a form of taxation which is contrary to the basis upon which we have always built our tax structure, namely, to relieve those who are least able and collect from those who are best able to pay.

"'The Democratic convention, held in 1924, adopted the following declaration: "We oppose the so-called nuisance taxes, sales taxes, and all other forms of taxation that unfairly shift to the consumer the burdens of taxation." So far as the record shows this position, assumed by the Democratic convention in 1924, has never been changed or modified. In the light of this declaration, it is now difficult to understand how and why the majority party in Congress should favor this character of legislation.

"'The membership of organized labor holds that the burden of taxation must be equitably distributed upon all classes of people. The sales tax violates this sound principle because, in operation, it imposes a burden upon those who are unable to bear it. Such a tax as the proposed sales tax will tend to delay a return to prosperity. It will further destroy the very limited buying power now possessed by the masses of the people. It will prevent the sale of manufactured goods and it will mean less food, warmth, and clothing for millions of men, women, and children. Labor will call upon its friends in Congress to defeat that section of the taxation measure which provides for a sales tax.'"

Here is advice from the National Grange, Washington, D.C., March 17, 1932:

"Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
"House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

"DEAR MR. FREAR: Replying to your letter of recent date, I note what you have to say regarding that feature of the new revenue bill relating to the sales-tax proposal. If the proposed sales tax should be enacted, according to my advice it would cost the 6,000,000 farm families of America at least $300,000,000 a year due to pyramiding.

"In answer to your question as to whether the Grange would still oppose the imposition of a sales tax if canned goods were exempted, I beg to say with emphasis that we would still be against it.

"As the Washington representative of the Grange, I was one of the first witnesses to appear before the Ways and Means Committee in connection with the hearings on the revenue bill. I told the members of the committee that we were opposed to a sales tax, because it was a tax on the necessities of the people and ignored the principle of ability to pay.

"It was not until shortly before the bill appeared that we began to hear rumors that the committee was seriously considering a general sales tax. We had no definite knowledge on the subject.

"If the bill passes the House with the sales tax proposal included, we shall, of course, fight it in the Senate. However, we hope that the provisions for a sales tax may be stricken from the bill in the House. Otherwise, even if it should be defeated in the Senate, complications might ensue in conference.

"I am convinced that if this legislation could be held up long enough to get the reaction of the people back home, the sales tax would not pass. In view of the condition of the rank and file of the people throughout the country, the proposal for a sales tax is nothing short of a legislative monstrosity. It should be killed and buried beyond hope of resurrection.

"I am enclosing herewith a copy of a letter on the subject which has been sent to all Members of Congress.

"Sincerely yours,

"FRED BRENCKMAN,
"Washington Representative."

"THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
"Washington, D.C., March 15, 1932

"To the Members of Congress:

"We recognize the unpleasant duty with which Congress is confronted in framing legislation to balance the Federal Budget, but we desire to register an emphatic protest against that feature of the new revenue bill which calls for the imposition of a sales tax.

"It is conceded that there are approximately 8,000,000 unemployed people in the United States at this time. Adding their dependents it would probably be conservative to say that 25,000,000 people are without any income today and many of them are subsisting upon charity. The disproportionate burdens of taxation which have been placed upon agriculture, together with the collapse of prices received for farm products, have worked the virtual ruin of our farmers. Combining the unemployed in our industrial centers with the agricultural population gives us a total of more than 50,000,000 people whose purchasing power has been greatly impaired or wholly destroyed.

"Further than that, on December 7, 1931, in response to a request for information from a Member of Congress, the then Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, stated that there were unpaid taxes due the Government and pending on appeal amounting to almost a billion dollars. These taxes are due principally for 1929 and previous years. Speeding up adjustments and collections in these cases would bring hundreds of millions of dollars into the Federal Treasury and would, to that extent, obviate the necessity for imposing new taxes.

"The imposition of a general sales tax would meet with the unqualified disapproval of the 27,000,000 people upon the farms of this country. The effects of such a tax under prevailing conditions would not only be oppressive but would delay the return of prosperity, and could not be justified.

"Yours respectfully,

"THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
"FRED BRENCKMAN,
"Washington, Representative."

This word is from the Farmers Union:

"THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND
COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
"Washington, D.C., March 16, 1932

"Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
"United States Representative, Washington, D.C.

"DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I sent telegrams to every State headquarters of the Farmers' Union about a week ago asking them to have their members to send telegrams and write letters to their respective Congressmen and Senators asking them to oppose the sales tax.

"Your truly,

"JOHN A. SIMPSON, President."

This is a brief that speaks for itself about Canadian taxes:

"MEMO FROM BRIEF PREPARED BY CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION—TAXATION

"It seems inevitable that the basis of taxation must be broadened, i.e., more people will have to pay taxes according to their ability.

"Last year a special committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in cooperation with other organizations, investigated the problems of taxation, not only in Canada but also in the United States, Great Britain, France, and other countries. This committee submitted the following recommendations to the Dominion Government:

"'(a) That the business profits war tax shall not be reenacted.

"'(b) That the income war tax act as regards corporations shall be repealed.

"'(c) That the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide the additional revenue needed by the Dominion Government.'

"At the last session of Parliament the business profits war tax act was not reenacted; the sales tax was readjusted so as to provide additional revenue, but the income war tax act as regards corporations was not changed.

"As we believe that the general policy outlined in these proposals is sound, we respectfully beg to submit the following similar representations to the present Government of Canada in the hope that Parliament will see fit to act favorably on them at the coming session:

"(a) That duplication of taxation be avoided as much as possible.

"(b) That the income war tax act as regards corporations shall be repealed.

"(c) That the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide additional revenue.

"In considering (a) and (b) attention is drawn to the case of a company operating in all the nine Provinces of Canada. This company is taxed by the Dominion Government; it is taxed by each of all cases as a corporation, its shareholders are also taxed by the Dominion, provincial and municipal government on property, business, dividends, and income.

"We submit that the Dominion Government should make an arrangement with the provincial governments, whereby this duplication would be, in part at least, avoided.

"In regard to the sales tax we beg to advocate:

"'That as the sales tax is a tax payable by the purchaser, manufacturers and wholesalers should not be held liable for any taxes which they cannot collect owing to the purchaser becoming insolvent or refusing to pay, even though the manufacturer or wholesaler has in the meantime advanced the amount of the tax to the government when making his monthly returns.'"

Mr. Speaker, here is a novel provision, that a taxpayer, whose business it is to collect his tax before delivery of goods to the wholesaler, is to be exempt from taxes passed on to the consumer after the wholesaler fails to pay for the goods. It is one of the inconsistencies that makes a sales tax unjust and objectionable.

The foregoing remarks are submitted, and without summing up let me say that, without reflection upon the committee's report, the sales-tax feature based on the hearings is not supported by any witness except as to painless administration by some official.

The policy was not approved for a temporary or permanent tax.

The reports contained in speeches oppose unanimously a consumers' tax, because a tax on necessities. For these reasons I submit the manufacturers' sales tax should be stricken from the bill.

Here is a last letter just received:

"THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND
COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
"Washington, D.C., March 17, 1932

"Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
"United States Representative, Washington, D.C.

"DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The Grange, the Farm Bureau, and the Farmers' Union all testified before the Ways and Means Committee against a sales tax. We are against it now. Our members all over the United States are writing their Congressmen and Senators, and sending them telegrams saying they are against the sales tax.

"I do not know whether Canadian farm organizations favor a sales tax or not. I would gamble a little that they do not favor it.

"We three farm organizations did not believe a sales tax was being seriously considered by the Ways and Means Committee. We shall certainly go before the Senate committee if the House passes the tax bill with the sales tax in it.

"We, the farmers, feel that for 3 months Congress has been passing large quantities of candy out to the big bankers, railroads, and other big business without any of it getting to the farmers. We consider that we have been rankly discriminated against in the blessings bestowed by the Government. But we are amazed to find that when there is a load to carry the burden is shoved onto our backs.

"I predict there are more voters in the Nation watching this sales tax than any one measure that has arisen in Congress since the World War.

"Yours truly,

"JOHN A. SIMPSON, President."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, every speaker who has addressed you with reference to this bill has impressed upon you the fact that this is a most important piece of legislation. There can be no question about that. It is not my purpose to discuss it technically, and I am not going to dwell upon its constitutionality. Our highly esteemed friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], went into that yesterday. Others have elucidated this phase of the question.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is there any question in the gentleman's mind but that the bill is unconstitutional?

Mr. JENKINS. I have heretofore indicated that I did not intend to discuss this phase of the question. No one can discuss it intelligently in the time allotted me, but I should say to my distinguished friend that I have gone into it rather extensively. At first blush it was my conviction that this bill was not constitutional, but as I went along and as I considered it, and as I considered the great emergency in which we find ourselves, I am about come to the conclusion that when this matter comes squarely before the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court, as it has always done, will be guided somewhat by the intentions of the framers of the legislation and of the Congressmen and Senators who enacted the legislation. The gentleman knows that the courts construe acts in the light of the intention of the legislators and in the light of the spirit of the legislation. The gentleman knows as well as any other lawyer here that the law is a growing proposition. It has grown and all of us who are lawyers here have seen it grow. We have seen the Supreme Court of the United States change its thinking with the changes of the times. If this bill proves to be a success or if this bill does what it is hoped it will do (although I am not here to prophesy that it will do everything that everybody hopes it will do), yet if the bill does what the proponents of it honestly think and hope it will do, I think the Supreme Court of the United States will find it to be consonant with the general-welfare clause of the Constitution.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean to say to this Congress that it is his judgment that the Supreme Court, because of popular clamor, will justify the Congress in undertaking to exercise a police power when it has not the power to suspend the operations of the fundamental law of the land? Is that the position that the gentleman takes?

Mr. JENKINS. No; I do not mean to say that, and I hesitate to think that the Supreme Court will do that; but at the same time the law grows as does public sentiment.

Mr. COX. That is exactly what the gentleman has said the Supreme Court will do.

Mr. JENKINS. No; I beg to differ with the gentleman. I say that the beauty of the law, in addition to its immutability, is its growth. Our Constitution was the product of the sentiment of the people, and the Constitution that responded to the sentiment of the people then is flexible enough now to respond to the sentiment of the people now if there is unanimity of sentiment.

Lincoln said:

The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate for the stormy present. Our case is new. We must think anew and act anew.

Of course the Supreme Court will hew to the letter of the law. I am not going to say beyond every peradventure that this bill is constitutional, because I lay no claims to being an authority on the Constitution, and I cannot discuss the subject exhaustively in 10 minutes, and perhaps not if I had 10 hours. It is a complicated question. Some of the great constitutional experts of the country discussed it before the Ways and Means Committee at great length. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] did not absolutely give you his opinion as he would a client that this bill would be unconstitutional. I dare say he hoped with the rest of us that if it does what it is sought to do that the Supreme Court will find some way to make it constitutional.

Mr. KELLER. Did not the Supreme Court in times past do exactly the thing the gentleman says and then reverse itself?

Mr. JENKINS. There is no doubt the Supreme Court has reversed itself. It is done, but I do not want to go into that further here.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. BECK. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in my modest contribution to the subject yesterday I said that the bill was constitutional?

Mr. JENKINS. No. I did not say that. I say that when the gentleman spoke yesterday he did not speak with the conviction that he has spoken heretofore on constitutional propositions. I gathered—and I followed him closely—I got the impression from the gentleman's remarks that he felt that if the bill does what it purports to do under title I, the Supreme Court of the United States might find it convenient to hold it constitutional.

Mr. BECK. I said that the Court might do so; but if the Court, in the face of its prior decisions, sustains the constitutionality of this bill, it will have to swallow the largest dish of crow that any court ever swallowed.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the Supreme Court should happen to adopt the principles expressed by that great liberal, Justice Brandeis, they will not have very far to go to determine that the bill is constitutional.

Mr. JENKINS. I thank the gentleman. I must proceed, for when lawyers become involved in discussion of constitutional questions, the discussion might run on interminably without anyone's being convinced either way.

The title to this bill is not expressive of the full purport of the bill. It contains no recitation of the fact that it is a revenue raising bill. The framers of the measure showed legislative cunning in this respect, for words such as "To encourage national industrial recovery" are much softer and less antagonistic than such words as "to raise revenue by increasing taxes."

Title I of this bill seeks to "encourage national industrial recovery" by stabilizing industry. If it does not stabilize industry, it will be unfortunate. If it does stabilize industry, it will accomplish what the country has been longing for for the past few years. This bill goes to heroic lengths in an attempt to accomplish this stabilization. In fact, it strains the Constitution to the utmost of its elasticity. It carries a tremendous grant of powers to the President. With that grant goes a commensurate responsibility.

I hope the President will fully realize the extent of these powers and that he will not permit them to be abused as they have been by those to whom he gave the authority to deal with the economy law as it applied to veterans' pensions and compensations. In the consideration of this measure before the Ways and Means Committee I sought to bring out from the witnesses their reaction to the sentence on page 3 of the bill which states "that such codes are not designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises", and in each instance I was assured that it was not the intention that this bill would crush out the small business. If it does, then its objects will have failed of accomplishment. I hope that the President and those given authority will remember that only a generation ago another Roosevelt, mightier yet than Franklin D., shook the very structure of our social and political order by his mighty licks against the trusts which were strangling the business life and ambition of many worthy men and enterprises in our land. From his efforts came the antitrust laws which this present measure seeks to abrogate. Time makes "ancient good uncouth" in some cases, but granting powers to organize for trade advantages should not be done indiscriminately and without regard to the past history of monopolies as they related to freedom of business efforts upon the part of the small business man.

There is one feature of title I that I do not much like, and that is the provision that gives the President the power upon his own motion under some circumstances to prescribe and approve a code of fair competition. It tends too strongly to dictatorship. The other sections of title I provide for a contractual basis between the interested parties before the President acts in an attempt to better the conditions of the interested industry and the interested employees. Executive force may easily become tyranny.

We cannot refuse to legislate simply because somebody might abuse his discretion. I have no fear that anyone will raise himself up as an industrial czar in this country and compel labor to perform or compel the employer, on the other hand, to do that which he does not within his rights wish to do. Cutthroat methods in industry and dissatisfied conditions among the unemployed conspired to deepen and intensify the depression. For instance, take the coal industry in my State. It lies prostrate today and has been prostrate for years. We have given it all sorts of stimuli, we have tried in every way—economically, commercially, and legally—to stimulate it; but in spite of all we can do, it fails to respond. There are millions upon millions of dollars invested in the coal industry in Ohio that today is idle, and there are thousands of the finest workmen in the world located in my district and other sections of Ohio who are out of employment today. If this will stabilize the coal industry, then I shall have been justified in having voted for it. Time will not permit me to discuss this part of the bill further, except to say that I have not favored inflation, for I maintain that inflation is artificial, and that like all things artificial it lacks permanence. A restoration of industry, with the accompanying restoration of labor, will furnish a buying power, which is the first step toward economic recovery.

THE PUBLIC WORKS BILL

During the depression most lines of endeavor have shown a dearth or a shortage. But this depression has surely brought forth a plenteous crop of economists. While there has been a great and varied crop of causes and cures for the depression, there has been quite a unanimity of opinion among economists to the effect that probably the best way to break the vicious circle that held business back would be for a forced campaign of employment of men and women. Many economists advocate that a program of public works carried on on a big scale would accomplish the desired result.

Some claim that a program of less than $10,000,000,000 would not accomplish it. Others claim that $3,000,000,000 will do it. It is in the hope that this remedy will have the desired result that I give this part of this bill my support. If it fails, it will not be a total failure, for money thus paid out will go largely for labor and will relieve the charitable organizations of the country by that amount. I do not attempt to justify the passage of the bill upon that ground but rather to lessen the sting of this failure if failure it must be.

Under this bill the President will appoint an administrator who will have greater powers over public works than any other man in the history of our country. His duties are well defined although very far-reaching. All public works heretofore provided to be done by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be done under the provisions of this bill when it becomes effective. This bill can reach public highways and many other activities which could not be reached by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, such as flood control, sewer construction, and so forth. The Government advances the money upon a 30 and 70 percent basis. The Government advances 30 percent as a gift or grant, while the public agency, State, municipal, or county must arrange to repay the other 70 percent. The amount to be appropriated is $3,300,000,000. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been authorized to expend $1,200,000,000, for this class of work which it has not expended. This amount will not be expended, for the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will, as I have already stated, be superseded by the provisions of this bill. I have maintained that it will not be necessary to spend the whole of this enormous sum of $3,300,000,000. If I have my way about this matter, I should have reduced this amount to about one half. It is almost impossible to appreciate how much a billion dollars really is. If I were to take one-dollar bills and lay them end to end, 1,000,000,000 of them would extend around the world four times.

This brings me to a consideration of the third, and to some the most important, branch of this bill. When the Government spends money somebody pays the bill. In this case many different plans were suggested. I cannot bring myself to agree that the plan provided in this bill is the best plan that could be adopted. If the total amount had been reduced, the amount needed to be collected would be reduced in the same proportion. That is the first change I should have suggested. I am opposed to the taxation of the dividends of corporations. The corporation profits are already taxed 13¾ percent. An additional tax on the dividends after distribution would be a clear case of double taxation. It tends to stifle investment in corporation activities, and most of the manufacturing business of the country is done by corporations. Likewise it is questionable whether the Government should increase the gasoline tax. The fact that $400,000,000 of this appropriation is set apart for roads is some justification for this tax. The increase of the normal tax should have been carried on to the big incomes in a fairer proportion. Under this bill a man with a $6,000 income finds his taxes increased 50 percent, while a man with a $100,000 income finds his tax increased only 6½ percent. A tax that would reach such transactions as those disclosed this week in the Senate investigations should have been substituted for the increase provided in this bill. Some step must be taken toward an income tax on gross income in the cases of large incomes at least. If this bill rehabilitates industry and relieves unemployment, the burden of the additional taxes will be lightened greatly. If the bill fails, then any tax contribution made by those who can afford to make it will be their contribution to the relief of those less favorably situated.

There are many features of this bill that are not to my entire liking. There are some changes I would make in it, but all legislation is the result of compromise; give and take is an almost necessary rule in order to procure fair legislation.

It will be necessary to employ thousands of men and women to carry out the various provisions of this bill. I think the President is asking for too much authority when he asks the privilege to make these appointments without Civil Service requirements. If he abuses this privilege, it will be only for the purpose of placing those of his own political persuasion in office. I hope he will not mix politics with human misery. I am lending my support to the measure from the purest motives and with the hope that we can again bring happiness to millions who are now distressed. There is no torture so severe to the industrious man as to be denied the opportunity to work. There is no condition so humiliating to the erstwhile successful and skillful artisan as to be compelled to accept charity. There is nothing so devastating to health and happiness as worry, and there is no human instinct quite so strong and so uncontrollable as the determination to project one's offspring from the pangs of hunger. Property interests appeal to the intellect. Human interests appeal to the heart. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 35 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware of the fact that in opposing this legislation I hazard the loss of the confidence of many whose good opinion and whose sympathy I want and need; but my duty is so clear and unmistakable that there is but one thing left for me to do and that is to meet my responsibility as I understand it and to the extent of my ability discharge it.

To me this is a serious hour, solemn and serious, because of the magnitude of the question at issue. My colleagues, we are about to do that which will probably mark the turning point in the political life of this Nation. Indeed, we are about to do that which may mark the end of representative government in America. I know that few of my brethren here are going to vote with me in the position that I shall take upon this bill, and yet I know that deep down in their hearts there are a few of them who will not approve of all I have to say. But one thing makes possible and tolerable the adoption of this measure and that is the unbounded confidence that the people have in the Chief Executive, in which I share, who is made the master, not only of the property of the people, but of their lives as well. There are a thousand reasons why this bill should not become law with title I carried in it, and I invoke the judgment, the conscience, and the intelligence of the individual Membership of this House upon this proposition. As for myself, I shall undertake in my feeble way to deal with but a few of these objections, those of a constitutional nature, having to do with title I of the bill.

The advocates of the measure have offered an analysis of the different provisions and have attempted to explain them. Before entering upon a discussion of the legal questions involved, I invite you to bear with me while we together reason about the provisions of title I. But before I proceed in my endeavor to analyze this title of the bill, let me say to the Members of this House that if you did not hear the speech of the great lawyer from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], who addressed this body on yesterday, see the RECORD and read what he had to say, and in the reading get a mental bath in this fountain of pure logic and reason. The gentleman is probably the best friend that the Constitution has in the entire country today, and I hope that you will read what he had to say in order that in this hour of turmoil and great disturbance you may regain your mental equilibrium.

Let us now consider title I of the bill.

Section 1 of title I begins by declaring that a national emergency productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry exists, which burdens interstate commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standard of living of the American people. The bill then declares it to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate commerce which tends to diminish the amount thereof and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanction and supervision and to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor and otherwise to rehabilitate industry, and to conserve natural resources.

To effectuate the policy thus laid down the President, in section 2 (a) of the bill, is authorized to establish such agencies as he may find necessary, to prescribe their authorities, duties, responsibilities, and tenure.

In paragraph (b) of section 2 the President is authorized to delegate any of the functions and powers vested in him under title I to such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint, and he is authorized to establish an industrial planning and research agency to aid in carrying out his functions under this title of the bill. All this involves the delegation of legislative power, which I will refer to later on.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman be good enough to withhold his question until a little later?

Section 3 deals with the question of establishing codes of fair competition. In paragraph (a) of this section one or more trade or industrial associations or groups may apply to the President for leave to set up trade agreements, and the President may approve these agreements, which are designated as code or codes, for fair competition for the trade or industry or subdivision thereof represented by the applicant or applicants, and these codes become binding upon every person, association, or group engaged in the line of industry represented by the applicant or applicants.

Paragraph (b) of section 2 reads as follows:

After the President shall have approved any such code, the provisions of such code shall be the standards of fair competition for such trade or industry or subdivision thereof. Any violation of such standards in any transaction in or affecting interstate commerce shall be deemed an unfair method of competition in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended. A violation of any provision of any such code shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof an offender shall be fined not more than $500 for each offense.

What does this mean? This means that any operator, fairly representative of an industry, may come to the President with what he represents is a fair code of competition, and may obtain the sanction and approval of the President, and upon the application of that one manufacturer, or whatever his business may be, he may set up a code of laws, binding not only upon the operator himself but binding upon every operator in that particular line of industry in America.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman states "upon the application of individual operator." The language of the bill is that "the President may, upon application by one or more trade or industrial associations or groups."

Mr. COX. Yes. I am familiar with that.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL (continuing):

That such associations or groups impose no inequitable restrictions on admission to membership therein and are truly representative of such trades or industries or subdivisions thereof.

Mr. COX. I stated that any operator or any trade association claiming to be representative of a certain industry may, upon his application alone, establish a code having the effect of law, that is binding upon every operator in that particular line of industry in this country.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOLAND. In title I of the bill, to which the gentleman has objected, it states:

That to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor—

Does the gentleman mean to say that the standards of labor should not be improved?

Mr. COX. Of course not. I am acquainted with the gentleman's sympathy and interest in labor. This has been made manifest many times to my own knowledge, and I have invariably agreed with him. Let me say to him that there is nothing in title I of this bill but despair for the group in which the gentleman manifests a special interest.

Mr. BOLAND. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that in Pennsylvania at this time we have a sweatshop investigation, and that the sweatshops all over the State of Pennsylvania are causing girls and young women to work for 60 and 90 hours a week for $3 a week?

Mr. COX. Oh, the courts have held time and time again that it is not within the competency of Congress to deal with a situation of the character stated by the gentleman. That is purely a matter for the determination of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes, I yield.

Mr. MAY. Has the gentleman known or read of any clearer delegation of legislative power to a dictator of industry than is conferred in this bill by these very codes that may be adopted?

Mr. COX. I have not. I am going to discuss that in just a moment.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. If this committee is so solicitous about labor as to undertake to regulate its working hours and its scale of pay, can the gentleman advance any reason why the committee would refuse to regulate the machine load of individuals in the industries of this country?

Mr. COX. I cannot.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I cannot yield further.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Since the committee has been brought into it, I would say that that is included in the working-conditions provision.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further for a colloquy between others.

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Chairman, regular order. The gentleman should be allowed to finish his statement.

Mr. COX. Paragraph (c) of section 3 makes it the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain violations of the provisions of a code of fair competition on the part of everyone, whether or not he be a party to the adoption of the code. In other words, a small operator finds himself in a situation where because of the action of a group of large operators he cannot carry on his business in a normal manner, he cannot conduct it according to his own notion and the necessities of his own case, but must submit to a limitation put upon him that comes down from the selfish action of a selfish and monopolistic group.

Paragraph (d) of section 3 reads as follows:

> Upon his own motion, or if complaint is made to the President that abuses inimical to the public interest and contrary to the policy herein declared are prevalent in any trade or industry or subdivision thereof, and if no code of fair competition therefor has heretofore been approved by the President, the President, after such public notice and hearing as he shall specify, may prescribe and approve a code of fair competition for such trade or industry or subdivision thereof, which shall have the same effect as a code of fair competition approved by the President under subsection (a) of this section.

Now, what do we find in the bill? We find that a single operator, a single manufacturer, fairly representative of the particular industry in which he labors, or a particular trade association may come in and initiate the setting-up of a code which has the effect of law and binding upon the country. And we find in the bill that a group of such operators may come together, form a code or what they designate as a code of fair competition, obtain the approval of the President, and it becomes binding upon every person in the country. And we find that the President may of his own accord set up a code of fair competition having the effect of law and make it binding upon every person engaged in any sort of industry in this country.

Now, my colleagues, I submit in the first instance that there is clearly a delegation of legislative power that is carried in the bill.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. COX. Yes; briefly.

Mr. DIES. Is it not a fact that under the present law these codes are agreed to by trade groups, with the approval of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. DIES. That has been true ever since the Federal Trade Commission Act was passed?

Mr. COX. I will pay my respects to the Federal Trade Commission in its cooperation with industry in the setting-up of trade agreements which have operated to the disadvantage of the producer of raw commodities. The Commission in this respect has aided and supported industry in its violation of the antitrust laws.

Now, as I said, this bill carries a delegation of legislative power. The courts have held that the legislative power is the supreme authority except as limited by the Constitution. It is the power that has the right to direct how the force of the community shall be employed for preserving the community and the members of it. It is that part of the sovereignty of the people which the people have decreed shall be exercised by the legislative branch of the Government and cannot be by this agency delegated to some other.

The power to set up an administrative agency as is proposed in this bill, to define its powers and fix its tenure, is a legislative function and not a ministerial act.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Assuming this bill were declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, would the gentleman then approve it?

Mr. COX. I can make no such violent assumption. Here no rule is laid down by Congress to guide the President. The exercise of the powers delegated is conditioned upon no fact, is consent upon the happening of no event, but is an unconditional grant to be exercised at will and as the President might elect.

I know it will be contended that in cases affecting the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, tariff regulations, and others, that the courts have upheld acts of Congress delegating certain powers claimed to be legislative. But in each and all of these cases Congress laid down general rules for the guidance of the agency, leaving to it merely the carrying out of details and the execution of the powers so conferred, or leaving to the agency the exercise of a discretion within limitations fixed, which Congress could not then exercise. In the instant case there is no discretion that the President may exercise which Congress cannot now exercise. The exercise of discretion is dependent upon the happening of no event. The creation of a code of fair competition having the force of law calls into play the exercise of legislative discretion and is legislation. It is a power that belongs to the people which Congress holds in trust and which Congress cannot give away.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Does not Congress still hold a string on the powers it is supposed to be delegating?

Mr. COX. Congress, of course, might assert its rights, and might tomorrow or the next moment after the adoption of this measure enact a measure repealing it. But suppose the Executive did not agree, and suppose that the majority was not sufficient to override the Executive veto, you would stand stripped of your constitutional powers because of your unconstitutional conduct in the adoption of the pending bill.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. If in the judgment of the speaker the bill were constitutional, would the gentleman favor its passage?

Mr. COX. I would not favor the bill because I believe title I to be dangerously violative of the Constitution.

Mr. REILLY. Does the gentleman believe a national emergency exists?

Mr. COX. Yes, I do; and I am for any legislation that gives work to the unemployed.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is making a very able argument in opposition to the bill and criticizing the plan suggested by the President of the United States for meeting the emergency the gentleman admits exists. I am wondering if the gentleman can offer to the House some plan for meeting this emergency that would be an improvement upon the plan offered by the President of the United States.

Mr. COX. I have no plan. I do not know what can be done, but I do respectfully contend that whatever is done should be done in a constitutional manner. With title I eliminated, the constitutional objections that I am raising would be met and the measure more acceptable.

I regretted to hear gentlemen, members of the great Ways and Means Committee and others, on yesterday contending that the Constitution has outlived its day and that it is not capable of answering the needs of the hour.

In this bill Congress delegates powers which it does not possess—the power to regulate and control the internal affairs of the States, the power to control all industries from the point of production to that of distribution, the power to regulate hours of labor and to fix wages. My colleagues, it is the most gigantic price-fixing scheme ever proposed in the history of any free government.

You undertake to fix minimum wages, when you must known that a minimum wage law is unconstitutional because it is a price-fixing law, directly interfering with freedom of contract, which is a part of the liberty of the citizen guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

The police power cannot be used to fix prices, either of property or of services, in a private business not affected with public interest, and cannot be used to suspend the Constitution.

The citizen has the right to sell his labor the same as he has the right to sell his property, and upon his own terms, and without restraint or prohibition imposed by government.

In the case of Adkins against Childrens Hospital, decided by the Supreme Court in 1923 and reported in 261 United States, page 525, this question was settled, and if you have any doubt about your power to fix minimum wages, then do me the kindness to listen to what the Court had to say in this case upon this particular point; and, mark you, the Court in this case was dealing with legislation enacted by the Congress for the District, and Congress alone legislates for the District, and in this respect occupies the same relationship to the people affected by the legislation as the legislature of a State occupies to the people affected by the laws it may pass.

> The statute now under consideration is attacked upon the ground that it authorizes an unconstitutional interference with the freedom of contract included within the guaranties of the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. That the right to contract about one's affairs is a part of the liberty of the individual protected by this clause, is settled by the decisions of this Court and is no longer open to question. Within this liberty are contracts of employment of labor. In making such contracts, generally speaking, the parties have an equal right to obtain from each other the best terms they can as the result of private bargaining.

And, quoting from the case of Adair against United States, a decision rendered by Mr. Justice Harlan, the Court said:

> The right of a person to sell his labor upon such terms as he deems proper is, in its essence, the same as the right of the purchaser of labor to prescribe the conditions upon which he will accept such labor from the person offering to sell. In all such particulars the employer and the employee have equality of right, and any legislation that disturbs that equality is an arbitrary interference with the liberty of contract which no government can legally justify in a free land.
> Included in the right of personal liberty and the right of private property—partaking of the nature of each—is the right to make contracts for the acquisition of property. Chief among such contracts is that of personal employment, by which labor and other services are exchanged for money or other forms of property. If this right be struck down—

Mark what the Court says—

> If this right be struck down or arbitrarily interfered with, there is a substantial impairment of liberty in the long-established constitutional sense. The right is as essential to the laborer as to the capitalist, to the poor as to the rich; for the vast majority of persons have no other honest way to begin to acquire property, save by working for money.
> "An interference with this liberty so serious as that now under consideration, and so disturbing of equality of right, must be deemed to be arbitrary unless it be supportable as a reasonable exercise of the public power of the State."

Here Congress is undertaking to exercise power which is claimed to be held under the commerce clause to regulate the internal affairs of the States, which the courts have held time and again is not within the power of Congress.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I have been very much interested in the constitutional argument the gentleman is making. Is the gentleman familiar with the most recent decision of the Supreme Court on the interpretation of the Sherman Law in the Appalachian coal case?

Mr. COX. Yes; I have read that case and discussed it on yesterday with the gentleman.

Mr. CELLER. Where they hold that 70 percent of the bituminous-coal miners could unite and make an agreement which would have the effect of even fixing prices. The Court held that this was perfectly permissible under the Sherman Act.

Mr. KELLER. May I ask what year that decision was rendered?

Mr. COX. The case I have referred to is a comparatively recent one, in 1923.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. ARNOLD. I just wanted to know the case the gentleman was quoting from.

Mr. COX. Adkins v. Childrens Hospital (261 N.S. 545).

The testimony of the witnesses representing industry appearing before the committee very frankly confessed that they wanted this bill because it would authorize competitors to come together and form price-fixing agreements now prohibited by the antitrust laws.

In the case of Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U.S. 337), the Court said:

> Whether the free operation of the normal laws of competition is a wise and wholesome rule for trade and commerce is an economic question which this Court need not consider or determine. Undoubtedly there are those who think that the general business interests and prosperity of the country will be best promoted if the rule of competition is not applied. But there are others who believe that such a rule is more necessary in these days of enormous wealth than it ever was. * * * Congress has in effect recognized the rule of free competition by declaring illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate and international commerce. As in the judgment of Congress the public convenience and the general welfare will be best subserved when the natural laws of competition are left undisturbed by those engaged in interstate commerce, and as Congress has embodied that rule in a statute, that must be for all the end of the matter, if this is to remain a Government of laws and not of men.

RICH MAN'S LAW

Mr. Chairman, there has never been a measure brought up in Congress which went further in the destruction of the sovereignty of States than is the case in the pending legislation, and every Member of this body knows this to be true.

Congress has no power of regulation, nor any direct control over the internal or domestic trade of a State. No interference by Congress with the business of the citizen transacted within a State is warranted by the Constitution except such as is strictly incidental to the exercise of powers clearly granted to it. The power to authorize or to license a business within a State is plainly repugnant to the exclusive power of the State over the same subject.

If the Constitution, as the advocates of the measure are contending, is not suitable to the exigencies of the hour, then why not proceed in a constitutional manner to make changes and give legality to that which you are now undertaking to do?

I know it is said that industry is for the pending bill. Of course, industry is for the law. This panic that has held this country in its grip for 10 years came upon us in 1923. The people who live close to the soil—the farmer who tills the land, the small business man, the small operator—all felt the pinch of want in 1923. Hard times continued and began to climb up, and now when it has reached the point where the industrialist—that part of business that represents money—feels it taking hold of them, these beneficiaries of special privilege, who have always contended that it is not within the power of Congress to put the Government in business, now come to Congress and appeal to Congress to put the Government in business in copartnership with them, in order that they may be saved or that the dollar may be saved the necessity of making its contribution to this readjustment of things through which we are passing.

They say, boastfully, that the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce is for the bill, that the representatives of steel are for it, that the representatives of the automobile industry are for it, that the representatives of the textile trade have come and pleaded for it. They boastfully say here that industry, as represented by these representatives of privilege, have come to this committee and have pleaded with the committee to adopt this law to save them, to make them secure in the advantage which they hold, to give them assurance of holding on to that which they have acquired as a result of the practices which they have carried on throughout these several years.

They talk about price fixing. Price fixing means high prices. Price fixing means a guaranty of profits to the operator. It means woe and misery to the consumer that has to buy the things that the price fixers make. Pass this law and you will find steel, you will find the textile people and you will find the automobile people, you will find the patent-medicine makers and you will find the jewelry people all coming here for the approval of a so-called "code of fair competition", which is nothing more than combinations in the restraint of trade, and made to give advantage of the consumer and the great unorganized public which should be protected. You set aside the law of competition which is the salvation of the small man. You subsidize industry at the cost of the consumer. You reward the class whose greed has caused this distress. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes. I desire unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, recently, in making inquiry of a prominent business man as to whether the bill before us, H.R. 5755, will bring about national industrial recovery and establish fair competition, the reply was made, "Try anything." I believe this is a very strong argument for the bill.

During President Hoover's administration many sane and sound proposals emanated from the White House. Even when adopted there were usually conditions tied to them which detracted from their efficiency. The Hoover administration, however laudable its purposes, was unable to stem the tide of depression and restore normalcy.

During the 2½ months just past propositions have been brought forward and written into law which I venture to say no Democrat would have favored if they had been suggested by former President Hoover during his term of office. [Applause.]

Since the new administration came in, every possible form of radical suggestion has been immediately supported by the subservient majority. What the outcome of some of these new laws will be, no one can forsee. We hope for the best. Certainly it is very apparent that the new laws are today popular with the people. Possibly one of the reasons is that the people are like a drowning man, grasping at a straw. So I feel that the advice of the gentleman referred to to "try anything" is quite likely to prove a good mode of procedure under existing conditions. Things are not normal and there is therefore some excuse for using abnormal methods of treatment.

Title I of the measure before us is another venture into untrodden paths. At one time the great cry was to curb monopoly. This bill does just the reverse. Its purpose is to foster closer cooperation within industries under a system of codes and licenses heretofore unknown.

So far as the evidence submitted to the Ways and Means Committee is concerned, an excellent case was made out. The hearing was one of the most complete from the standpoint of the presentation of the subject matter within my experience, and there was perfect unanimity among the witnesses as to the need for the proposed legislation.

It was supported by representatives of both capital and labor. We have the evidence of a distinguished Senator who has studied industrial and social problems for many years and who has been responsible for much legislation along the lines of this bill. We have the evidence of one of the authors of the bill, a gentleman who has long been a student of labor problems, and of the president of the American Federation of Labor, the outstanding organization of the working classes of the United States. We have the evidence of the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, an organization representative of the industrial and commercial interests of the country. And finally, we have the evidence of the Director of the Budget, which, we assume, means the administration itself. Certainly, with such a group of men thus favorable to the underlying principles of the bill, the average layman, even though himself a Member of Congress, would hesitate to withhold approval of the measure.

I admit natural prejudice against legislation of this type, but I want to defend my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee who may feel as I do about this measure. The time to show opposition is when a bill is in the making. The intention to present such a measure, although it was not actually before us, was well known throughout the country some time in advance of its introduction. There was ample opportunity to get these expressions of opposition, if they existed, before the Ways and Means Committee; but absolutely none was presented.

In advocating the bill, President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, said:

> This proposed legislation marks a very definite step forward in industrial stabilization, rationalization, and economic planning. The bill is appropriately termed an industrial-recovery measure. It is, in the judgment of labor, the most outstanding, advanced, and forward-looking legislation designed to promote economic recovery that has thus far been proposed. In the opinion of labor, it will, when passed and applied, prove to be a real, practical, constructive remedy for unemployment.

President Harriman, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, spoke particularly of the need for the regulation of competition in industries, calling attention to the adverse effect of unrestrained competition upon labor. He said:

> I believe the time has come when we must take out of competition the brutality of competition. We must take out of competition the right to cut wages to a point which will not give an American standard of living, and we must recognize that capital is entitled to a fair and reasonable return, and that, therefore, goods must be sold at a price which will enable the manufacturer to pay a fair price for his raw material, to pay fair wages to his men, and to pay a fair dividend on his investment.

Title II of the bill covers the subject matter in which we as representatives of the people should have a broad interest. It is called the public-works and construction-projects section, and creates one of the most powerful officials that this Government has ever set up, not only authorizing the use of Federal officers and employees indiscriminately, but likewise State and local officers and employees, all exclusive of Civil Service and the Classification Act. It substitutes for former methods of Government construction of public works the policies of this all-powerful Presidential appointee. Again, it well may be said, "Try anything."

Mr. Green, of the American Federation of Labor, made what seemed to me the most constructive suggestion of an amendment submitted by any witness when he advocated a change in the language of section 203. He urged that grants of Federal aid to States, municipalities, or other political subdivisions be not limited to 30 percent of the cost of labor and materials employed in such projects. He saw in this limitation the possibility of further draining small communities by people looking for employment under the bill in large centers of population, and suggested that there should be a public-works project carried on simultaneously in every community so that idle men could find work in their own home towns. Mention was made of the fact that since the money to pay for this building project must come from all the taxpayers of the Nation, all taxpayers should have some of the benefits. It seems to me that where there are emergency public works which are carried on for the purpose of giving employment, exactly as much benefit would accrue in small communities and to families by bringing work to the people rather than the people to the work. The Director of the Budget opposed Mr. Green's proposal on the ground that inasmuch as the grant of even 30 percent was an innovation in governmental policy it would be better to retain the limitation.

To place in the hands of any one man or group of men over $3,000,000,000 of public money is incomprehensible. I want particularly to call attention to the President's message to Congress wherein he said a careful survey had been made. He said:

> A careful survey convinces me that approximately $3,300,000,000 can be invested in useful and necessary public construction, and at the same time put the largest possible number of people to work.

If such a survey is in existence, Congress should have the benefit of it. Out of $3,300,000,000, the only amount specifically designated for any one purpose is $400,000,000 for roads. Why should not all the money be allocated to particular items and described in the bill?

The opportunity to spend nearly $3,000,000,000 without knowledge on the part of Congress as to what sums will be spent on the various undertakings, which are outlined in the bill only in general terms—the privilege of devoting almost the entire amount to any one of the projects mentioned, even though the right be not exercised, is a power that should not be given any man or group of men.

The only part of this bill which was left to the Ways and Means Committee to write itself was section 208, the tax provision; and, in the language of the street, the committee did a bum job. It is the most unreasonable tax provision that I have ever seen, and I am proud to say that not a Republican member of the committee voted for it.

While four separate plans were submitted to the committee by the Director of the Budget, he declined to recommend any one of them as being favored by the administration. He did state that at a later time he would be very glad to make a " very specific " recommendation. What that recommendation is I have not been able to find out.

Although the President prepared and sent to the Congress all the other portions of the bill, he failed to make any provision for raising the necessary revenue to carry out the purposes of the bill. I do not wonder that the tax provisions of the bill were left blank, however, and that he has " passed the buck ", so to speak, to us. The imposition of taxes at any time is unpopular with the people, and at this time this is especially true. If the President had suggested a tax program, he would have had to assume the responsibility for it. He, and not the Congress, would be the object of popular disfavor for imposing additional tax burdens upon the people. Now it will be very easy for him to avoid any responsibility by saying, when he signs the bill, that if he had written the tax provisions the levies would have been of an entirely different character.

Since the President sent to the Congress a ready-made bill to be rubber-stamped by his subservient majority, he should have completed the job and included the necessary tax program. He cannot escape his responsibility by saying that tax bills must originate in the House of Representatives. We could have voted his tax recommendations up or down, just as we can do his other recommendations.

The bill increases the normal income-tax rate from 4 to 6 percent on the first $4,000 of taxable income, and from 8 to 10 percent on the remainder.

Now, not a Republican member of the committee voted for it. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman says that not one Republican member of the committee voted for it. In the report it is stated that the minority was unanimously opposed to the plan submitted. Will the gentleman inform the Committee what tax plan the minority did unanimously favor?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am coming to that directly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I wish the gentleman would answer my question.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will answer it. I will say that the minority is not responsible for this bill's being on the floor today. It was the duty of the majority to write the kind of a bill they saw fit.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did the minority agree among themselves on any definite plan?

Mr. TREADWAY. We did not try; we had no occasion to do it. It was your job to write it.

The present rates are the same as those imposed in the years immediately following the war, and the proposed rates are practically the same as those imposed in 1918, when the rate was 6 percent on the first $4,000 and 12 percent on the balance. To impose any higher rates than those now carried in existing law would impose an undue hardship upon the average citizen, who is already paying a much higher income tax than has previously been imposed in peace times.

When it is proposed to increase by 50 percent the tax on incomes of people receiving from three to six thousand dollars, and only increase incomes of $500,000 by 3.8 percent, the gravest injustice is done to the breadwinners with small salaries. The same percentages apply for both married persons and single persons. I will offer for the RECORD, for insertion at the conclusion of my remarks, a table showing the percentage of increase in various income brackets up to $1,000,000.

Now, the payment of money is popular. You can get popularity if you are a spendthrift, but when you come to the taxpayer and tell him that he must pay that spendthrift bill you are going to be mighty unpopular. The administration took the popular end of the game and let the Congress have the unpopular end. The President cannot avoid any final responsibility, he must take the measure that Congress may pass.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman state what justification there was for the small increase in the higher brackets?

Mr. TREADWAY. The schedule I will print is a decreasing one. At $3,000 and from $3,000 to $6,000 income, the increase is exactly 50 percent. At $7,000 it is 42.1 percent, and so on. As your income increases your taxes decrease.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Briefly.

Mr. KNUTSON. What increase did the majority make in incomes of a million dollars or more?

Mr. TREADWAY. About 3.5 percent.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If you leave out of consideration the surtaxes, would the percentage of increase be the same?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. There is no increase of surtaxes in this bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; but you do worse, you tax dividends.

The proposal to tax at the normal rates dividends received from corporations is a radical departure from previous income tax laws. Not even during the war days was such a levy imposed. The reason for exempting dividends from the normal tax is, of course, that they are already subject to a normal tax which is paid by the corporation, the present rate of which is 13¾ percent. On top of this tax, the recipient of the dividend must include the income received from this source with other income for the purpose of the surtax, the rates of which reach a maximum of 55 percent under the present law. To add another 6 or 10 percent would be a clear case of double taxation of the same income. The 10 percent rate, when added to the 13¾ percent corporation rate and the maximum surtax rate of 55 percent, makes a total of 78¾ percent. The making of dividends subject to the normal tax, in effect, adds 6 to 10 percent to the present corporation levy of 13¾ percent. It should be borne in mind that the corporation tax is subtracted from the corporate earnings available for dividends, and the result is that the incidence of the tax is on the recipient. Therefore, the imposition of this new levy does not constitute the placing of a tax where none was imposed before, but simply adds another burden on owners of stock, a great many of whom are persons of ordinary means and widows with moderate incomes.

The increased gasoline tax is objectionable for several reasons. In the first place, the States have already preempted the field of gasoline taxes, some having levies as high as 7 cents a gallon. The Federal Government, when it levied the present 1-cent tax, encroached upon this form of taxation as an emergency measure, and to levy any additional Federal tax will only result in driving the States out of this field. It is well known that the gasoline tax is passed on to the consumers, a large part of whom are farmers. Automobile owners are already the most heavily taxed class of persons in the country.

It seems to me that instead of piling more and more taxes on those who have been bearing the brunt of Federal taxation, we should spread the burden out over a larger group of the population, especially the taxes imposed for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of this bill. In the present emergency, everybody should contribute since it is expected that everybody will be benefited by the bill.

The one call today is for a form of tax certain to produce results. The taxes that have been selected can to a degree be made nonproductive by being made excessive. A wave of justice is spreading over the country. In all sections of the land there is a call for a fair and equitable tax levied against the people in accordance with their spending ability. Exempting food, clothing, and medicine from a sales tax avoids the accusation that you are taxing the poor more than the rich.

The more I have studied the sales tax the surer I have become of its merits. A tax of 1.8 percent with exemptions as stated will furnish the revenue necessary to finance this bill. I hope to see some sanity shown at the other end of the Capitol and anticipate that when the measure is taken up in the Senate a sales tax will be substituted for the inequalities of section 208 as written by the Ways and Means Committee.

I think a motion to recommit to that end would have an excellent chance of adoption here today. I am doubtful whether a motion for a higher rate of sales tax in order to remove certain existing excise taxes which are extended for a year by this bill would be approved.

I dislike extremely to vote for the bill with the tax provisions which the Ways and Means Committee agreed to, but as yet I see no other course. I would gladly vote for the bill with the sales-tax provision such as I have described.

I should like to now address myself to a feature of the bill to which little attention has been given. Its general purpose, of course, is to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry. The whole cost and price structure of the country is to be raised. However, the bill makes no provision for preserving this price and cost structure from the ravages of foreign competition. No compensatory duties are proposed to offset this increased domestic cost. The question may well be asked, How are we going to maintain our increased wage level and higher price level if we are going to permit cheap foreign goods which are not subject to this burden of higher taxes, higher wages, and shorter hours of employment to be dumped upon our markets in competition with our own goods? The disparity between foreign and domestic costs is already very marked and has been aggravated by the depreciated currency situation. If this bill serves its purpose, as we all hope it will, this disparity of costs will be even greater. How long can our domestic producers and workers compete with cheap foreign labor which is beyond our control? Unless something is done to offset low foreign costs, our own prices and wages will have to be reduced to the standard of competing countries if domestic producers and workers are to be able to sell their products in the home market. It seems to me that this is a matter which should have serious consideration by the administration, since the absence of compensatory duties to offset increased domestic costs may easily destroy the whole purpose of the bill.

In connection with the issuance of the $3,300,000,000 of bonds provided for in the bill, there is a matter to which I wish to call the attention of the House. These bonds will be made free of Federal taxes, as have other bonds issued during the current session and in prior years. The total amount of tax-free securities outstanding at the present time is tremendous, aggregating some $40,000,000,000. Such securities provide a means of tax evasion for the ultra rich, and for them only, since governmental securities, whether Federal, State, or local, seldom fall into the hands of the small investor.

Tax exemption of Government bonds results in two different ways. In the first place, the Constitution impliedly prohibits the taxation by the State of any Federal instrumentality, and conversely, the taxation by the Federal Government of any State instrumentality. This kind of tax exemption cannot be done away with except by amendment of the Constitution. In the second place, both the States and the Federal Government usually exempt their respective bonds from their own taxes. This is done to procure lower interest rates and to place Federal and State bonds upon an equal competitive footing with bonds that are necessarily tax exempt. At the present time, however, there appears to be no good reason for continuing this second class of tax exemption. Federal bonds, even though they be made subject to Federal tax, would be quickly grasped by investors, due not only to the fact that State and municipal governments have practically exhausted their credit but also to the further fact that the market for industrial bonds is very negligible.

In the Revenue Act of 1932 we increased the normal and surtax rates to almost war-time levels, and in the pending bill the normal tax is still further increased. Investment in tax-free securities provides an easy means of avoiding income taxes, and the amount of taxes saved more than compensates an investor for the lower rate of interest paid on such bonds. It seems to me that at a time like this, when we are seeking more and more taxes, we should not pass up the opportunity to tax the interest paid to holders of the bonds which we propose to issue. How can the Congress justify itself in imposing heavy tax burdens upon the average citizen and in the same bill providing a means whereby the wealthy can absolutely escape Federal taxation?

Already this session we have passed bills authorizing immense bond issues with the usual clause exempting such bonds from Federal taxes. For example, the Wagner relief bill provided for $500,000,000 of new bonds, the farm mortgage bill for $2,000,000,000 more, the home mortgage bill for another $2,000,000,000, and we are adding $3,300,000,000 by the pending bill. We have an opportunity now to stop this practice of tax exemption without in the least impairing the salability of these bonds. We should not hesitate to seize it. If this $40,000,000,000 of tax-free wealth which we have in this country could be compelled to pay its fair share of the tax burden, the Budget could easily be balanced and the additional taxes carried by this bill eliminated, not to mention many of the existing levies.

I will close my remarks about as I commenced. A balloon has been sent up which may or may not aid industry and return people to work. We have tried various expediencies without success. Here is a new lotion. Try it. Try anything. [Applause.]

Mr. WEST of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, it was my original intention to register my approval and opinion upon this bill by my vote only. Voting on a measure of this sort I consider the very highest constitutional duty imposed upon a Congress. It may seem strange that it should have been the wonderful speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], in opposition to the measure yesterday that impels me today to briefly attempt to voice my reasons for supporting the measure. I have often said that there can be only two good reasons for making a speech. One is to give information and the other is to afford entertainment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania always lives up to the very highest measure of that standard, every time he takes this floor. Every speech he makes fairly bulges and bursts with information upon any subject to which he addresses his great mind, and the beauty and polish of his sentences, his facility of expression, the keenness of his logic, and the matchless manner in which he uses the English language to express his thoughts affords the very highest character of entertainment for all those who are so fortunate as to have the privilege of listening to him. [Applause.] I always listen to him with admiration, and I follow him whenever I can. I wish I could justify my own speech here by the standard which I have raised, but perhaps I can explain my reaction to that great speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by telling a little personal incident. During the World War Congress there was on this floor a great battle upon the question of conscription. Our Nation had voted for war. The question before the Congress was the right of the Nation under our Constitution to draft our young men and send them to fight in a foreign war. I opposed that proposition on the floor because I felt it was in opposition to the ideals of the American people and the past history of English-speaking nations.

After I finished my speech Mr. Kahn, of California, who led the fight for conscription, and Frank Reavis, of my own State—and I might say that two abler statesmen never sat in this House during my time—came over to me and said, "SHALLENBERGER, you made quite an argument on your side of the question, and we thought that we would come over here and tell you that we are not going to pay any attention to anything you said." [Laughter.] Or perhaps I could illustrate it in another way to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] by repeating a remark of a Scotch friend of mine, who said to me one day, "SHALLENBERGER, I have heard many a speech that changed my mind, but never one that changed my vote." [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. BECK. First thanking the gentleman very much for the gracious reference made to my speech, which was far more than it deserved, let me ask this question: Is it not a fact that the lawyer and graduate of West Point who drew the conscription law against which the gentleman voted is to be the economic dictator under this bill?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not entirely agree with the statement that he drafted that law. I think General Crowder and other distinguished men had something to do with drafting of that bill.

I want to address myself to the constitutional side of this question, although I am not a lawyer. I know it is the constitutional problems that bother lawyers like the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the great lawyer from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. I remember 32 years ago, when I came to this Congress, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and Claude Kitchin were with me in that Fifty-seventh Congress. Mr. POU and I are the only two men that are in this House that were here then, and I understand there is no one in the body at the other end of the Capitol who was here at that time.

The first time I met Mr. Kitchen to have any conversation with him was over in the little library office here on this floor. I had introduced a bill at that time seeking to control monopoly, to regulate trusts, and in that bill I had written a provision requiring a Federal license before corporations could engage in interstate commerce. I am interested to see that a provision of that kind is in the bill that we are considering today. Mr. Kitchin and Asher Hinds were there in this library room. Mr. Hinds was the greatest parliamentarian ever in this body. He was the parliamentary clerk to Thomas Brackett Reed, one of the great Speakers of this House. We entered into conversation about this matter, and Mr. Kitchin, who was one of the greatest constitutional lawyers and the keenest debater I ever knew, contended with me that the provision to which I have just referred was unconstitutional.

After he had finished I said to him:

Mr. Kitchin, I am not a lawyer, but I do not interpret the purpose of the Constitution as you do. You are construing it by the strict letter of the written page, but I read it in the light of the spirit of the English-speaking peoples. I do not think our forefathers framed that Constitution to bind us down. I think they wrote it to set us free. I believe we can do anything under the Constitution necessary for the safety of the Republic and to promote the welfare and happiness of the American people.

Every power in the Constitution was put there for that purpose. If you cannot find it in the letter of the law, you will find it in the spirit of liberty that runs through it everywhere. Mr. Kitchin said:

SHALLENBERGER, you are not a Democrat; you are a Republican.

I said:

I may be a Republican in my liberal interpretation of the Constitution, but on election day, some way or another, I always find a Democratic ticket.

And so my contention is now that conditions confront us that warrant the trust that the Constitution of the United States will permit the use of any power that is essential to maintain the security and prosperity of the people.

That this bill gives war-time powers to the President of the United States, no one will deny. But the justification for this tremendous and unusual grant of power to the Executive is that the Nation is today and now at war with economic ruin, at war with agricultural and industrial bankruptcy, at war with unemployment, with poverty, and suffering. Yes; perhaps waging a war against revolution itself.

Extraordinary Executive power has been granted by Congress many times before. We granted it to Abraham Lincoln, to Woodrow Wilson, and to William McKinley in the hour of war, and we are waging war now.

There is no power granted the President in this bill that is not necessary to meet the present national emergency and defeat the economic enemy already within our gates.

This tremendous grant of power given to the President is to protect the people, not to destroy them; to lift them up, not to cast them down. The President is given a legal sword and shield, not to fight against us but to fight for us. He is given power in this bill, not to chain and enslave us, but to set us free. The people of this Nation trust the President of the United States. They trust President Roosevelt, and they believe in his promises, even though there may be some Congressmen who seem to be lacking in faith in the President and in his pledges and promises to the American people.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL. The gentleman says he thinks the President has the power to do anything for the welfare of the people. How does the gentleman construe the tenth amendment, which says that all powers not specifically delegated to the Congress are reserved to the States and to the people?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Well, I do not consider the Constitution in that way. I will say that the English people were the first who had a constitution, of which ours is practically a written copy. The English constitution is written only in the minds and hearts of the English people, and under that liberal, though unwritten constitution, they have given to the nations and the peoples of the world the greatest system of laws to preserve the rights and liberties of free people everywhere that has ever come from any nation upon earth. The proudest thing that belongs to the Anglo-Saxon people is the fact that under a liberal constitution such as we enjoy we have been able to work out our problems of human rights and of modern civilization. So I believe our Constitution will permit us to do anything that is essential for our people, even as the British constitution has enabled the people of Great Britain to lead the world in all things that stand for the good of humanity and of law and justice among men. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield.

Mr. COX. In the recommendation that the representatives of industry made to the gentleman's committee, was it indicated that industry wanted this law and order, in order that they might form monopolies?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No. I do not think they would admit that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am sorry I cannot answer the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, as a member who has been recently given an assignment on this committee, I want to express my sincere appreciation to the chairman and to the members of the committee for the universal courtesies extended to me during the consideration of this act.

If anyone had told me a few years ago that I would have given support to a measure that would appropriate over $3,000,000,000 to States, municipalities, and certain industries, and in some cases without reimbursement, I would have said that person was crazy. I have always felt it was my duty to try to keep down expenditures as much as possible, but on this occasion I am giving my whole-hearted support to this measure. I feel that the emergency conditions which exist throughout the Nation are such as no citizen has ever experienced before. I know that unless we raise prices of commodities there cannot be any such thing as prosperity. I know that unless we furnish labor the means of obtaining employment they cannot have the buying power necessary to raise the prices of commodities. I know that those problems dovetail one with the other, and that it is absolutely necessary to do something to start the wheels of commerce moving once more.

Some have raised the question of constitutionality. I have always believed that the Constitution was written for the people. I have noticed in the past in some instances where the Supreme Court has held that a bill was unconstitutional; later the same Court has looked upon the question from the standpoint of expediency perhaps, or the standpoint of necessity, or the standpoint of what the people should have, and have changed their opinion. I refer specifically to the income tax law. So members of the Supreme Court will take into consideration existing conditions throughout the Nation. They realize that the welfare of this country depends upon the people being happy, and to be happy they must be employed, and there is not any other way of getting around it.

It is true there are some provisions in this bill that I am utterly opposed to.

I could not conscientiously support a measure to further increase the tax on gasoline. The oil industry is the second largest industry in the Nation. It has an investment that represents more than $12,000,000,000. It should be reserved to the States rather than to the Federal authority to place an additional burden on such an industry. In some States gasoline, a byproduct, is taxed at 7 cents per gallon. Some refiners today are wholesaling the product at 1½ cents per gallon. I do not know of any industry in the country or in the world that is taxed in the same proportion as the byproducts of oil. Yet we are faced with an emergency that is more important than the question of taxing any particular commodity; and, this being true, I am willing to surrender my own views, hoping that in some way we can regulate this industry in a way that will not cause its complete emasculation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The States during the past year have collected over $500,000,000 from a tax on gasoline; and, inasmuch as it all cannot be passed to the consumer, the condition of the oil producers and more especially independents has reached a crisis. Those engaged in the oil industry in 1929 made a profit of over $400,000,000. According to the figures presented me, unless conditions should improve, these companies will face a loss of over $50,000,000 this year. I feel sure that the time is not far distant when a new policy will be put into effect concerning this subject and that Federal taxes on gasoline now imposed will be rescinded, thus leaving this entire field to the State, as during stringent periods when individuals are not able to pay taxes on their real estate many of the States are compelled to use a tax on commodities in order to defray their running expenses. I am advised that this situation now exists in a number of the States, and we are all hoping that this bill will bring about a restoration of confidence and a utilization of idle labor to the extent that conditions will be better in the future.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield for a short question.

Mr. WILCOX. Some days ago Congress passed as part of the farm relief bill a measure empowering the President to inflate the currency. Did the Ways and Means Committee, in considering methods and means of financing this public-works program, consider the matter of requesting the President to exercise this power to inflate the currency rather than to issue $3,300,000,000 additional bonds to be paid for and retired by these onerous and burdensome taxes to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I may say to the gentleman that nearly every kind of a proposition one could think of was presented to this committee. An important fact we must take into consideration is that the items that are necessary to raise revenue must be fixed and certain. Unless they are fixed and certain it has a material bearing not only on the bonds that will have to be sold but on the outstanding bonds of the United States, and that means the credit of this Nation.

Further, may I say that while criticism of those in authority may be heard for bringing in a rule—you may call it a gag rule—the Members of the House must understand that every sentence in this legislation was carefully studied, analyzed, put under a microscope, if you please, for the purpose of finding out its true relation to existing law, and if this bill had been brought in wide open, in my opinion there would have been added amendments that would have made it easy for some court to declare the legislation unconstitutional.

So, in the interest of the people, in the interest of conditions, with the hope that normalcy could be restored, we are proceeding in the best manner that we know how.

I regret exceedingly that the limited time allotted to me will not permit the kind of discussion that I should like to make on this subject. Therefore in closing I will say, let us all put our shoulders to the wheel, let us uphold the hands of our great President, let us appreciate the enormity of the program that he is now sponsoring, and, above all, let us as quickly as possible as Members of Congress do everything in our power to aid the distressed and downtrodden to the extent that once more we may have a happy, smiling citizenship as in the days gone by.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question before he yields the floor?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I prefer to yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma just said that this bill and its various features had been subjected to the microscope. I rather think that we used a telescope to get a little distance and vision as to what may happen rather than to analyze it under a microscope.

However, in the first place I wish to call attention to the statement made yesterday by the distinguished gentleman, the leader of the majority, a statement that I say was most unfair. I think everybody will realize it who stops to consider the attitude of the Republicans in the House during this session. Mr. BYRNS said:

> Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the very kind attention of the House during the few minutes I am privileged to occupy, and I am sure my friends upon the Republican side will understand when I say that my remarks are going to be particularly addressed to my Democratic colleagues [applause], because it is evident that we can expect little support for any Democratic effort to hasten the passage of any measure proposed by the President of the United States in the effort to relieve the distress in this country, from the remarks that have been made.

Now, I think that is certainly a most unfair statement. The gentleman from Tennessee is at all times so eminently fair that I think he must have suffered from a temporary aberration in order to make a statement of this kind. I do not think the Republicans have been obstructionists in any degree in this session. We got a very severe licking last fall and I think we have been taking it in about as good a sporting way as we can be expected to, and we have gone along with and supported the administration in a way that does not warrant a criticism of this kind.

The gentleman from Tennessee said further:

> This is the administration's bill. Do not make any mistake about that. Every line of it has been written and proposed by those representing the administration, except that feature which carries the question of taxes.

Let me say that this question of taxes also came as nearly direct as it could from the administration. The Director of the Budget submitted four plans to us, and on motion of one of the members of the majority side we voted on plan no. 1 and adopted it, because they had 14 votes to our 11.

So there was no further consideration of any other plan than the one presented by the Director of the Budget. I asked one or two members of the committee whom I felt were near the throne and might be in close contact with the President, if we deferred making our recommendation and waited for the President to send a message, had the President any other subject matter under consideration in relation to taxes or had he anything except the four plans that were outlined at that time. I was told the President had no other plan than the subject matter that was laid down in the four plans that were submitted to us.

Personally I supported the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] for a limited sales tax, plus a raise in the normal rates. Of course, what we hear constantly stressed in connection with this bill is the necessity for emergency legislation. This is an emergency, and I am afraid that the word "emergency" in the days to come is going to plague you about as much as the word "normalcy" did our side of the House a few years ago. There is this difference, however: The emergency is with us and normalcy I do not think ever arrived.

There is no question about the tremendous power that has been granted to the President of the United States in this legislation, but, again, the emergency is cited as making it necessary. If you closely analyze the power that is conferred upon the President in this bill it makes the distinguished dictator, Mussolini, look like an Egyptian mummy. [Laughter.]

Whether a great plan of public works, with a very small percentage of them self-liquidating, is a sound procedure at this time, I am not quite certain, but if one criticises an existing program the least he can do is to make his criticism as constructive as possible and offer something that is better, and in the absence of this I may say that I am ready to go along and support this bill. [Applause.]

There is another proposition involved here and that is the tax problem that we discussed a minute or two ago. Last year we had a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee appointed to discuss and consider the problem of double taxation as between the Federal Government and the State and other subdivisions. Now we are going to tax dividends, under this bill, three times—not double taxation but triple taxation. Dividends pay a tax at the source of origin and they are subject to a surtax over $6,000, and now they will be subject to the normal rates of 6 and 10, and therefore we are taxing dividends three times in this bill.

When we discussed the sales tax I asked the Director of the Budget, Mr. Douglas, whether in the computation of the revenue this would bring in they had subtracted the revenue produced under the existing excise taxes on radio, refrigerators, jewelry, and other commodities and he said, "No; we do not intend to lose any revenue. We intend to leave those taxes plus the sales tax." I said that that would be double taxation, because a great many commodities would pay a tax twice. He said, "We cannot afford at this time to lose any revenue", and he added, "Many things, Mr. Congressman, in this country are taxed twice."

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. COX. With respect to the attitude of industry which now professes an interest in labor, would industry have wanted this bill if it had been indicated that the committee expected to write into the law a selective manufacturers' sales tax or would industry have wanted the bill if provision for meeting the cost of the building program were to be made so that the cost would be met by the issuance of currency, which would mean the cheapening of money and, therefore, putting a part of the burden upon industry itself?

Mr. CROWTHER. Let me say to the gentleman from Georgia that industry, as it was represented at the hearing, apparently wanted this bill. I do not think we had anybody there who was against the bill, with possibly a single exception. They were against the methods of taxation, but I do not remember that anybody was against the bill and the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Federation of Labor, and various groups and individuals were not finicky about the method of taxation, although this did not agree with the former attitude of the American Federation of Labor against a sales tax.

Mr. RAGON. If the gentleman will permit I should like to call his attention also to the endorsement of the bill by the Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes; and they did not offer any great objections to the method of taxation. They offered some new methods of taxation, just as we did among ourselves, but they said they would not quarrel with the method of raising the revenue, although, let me say right here, I fail to see the necessity for raising any revenue at this time.

Thirty percent of this money is a gift, as it was described by the Director of the Budget, and, therefore, 70 percent has to be repaid. I know it has been said that you cannot immediately start your amortization unless you have provided for it by what is termed a certain and sure revenue, but it seems to me that if 70 percent is to be repaid—and the bill says, parenthetically, it is to be loaned on reasonably sound security—what is the necessity of levying any taxes at this time; and on the other hand, I think the Democratic Party and its leaders are meeting themselves coming back traveling in circles, so to speak, with respect to their policy of inflation.

I voted against inflation because I do not think it is a sound policy, but you folks made it a sound policy and paved an avenue up to the front door of the White House and you gave the President the privilege of issuing $2,000,000,000 worth of non-interest-bearing currency. The policy of issuing bonds with the necessary provision for raising revenue by taxation to go along with it evidently was anathema to the Members on the Democratic side of the House and I know that the inflationists said that it was wrong and reactionary, but you did not go to the White House to find out if that plan could be applied to this bill. This could have been done very handily and it would have been completely under control. Instead of doing this, you provided for renewing the old game of issuing bonds with the necessity of providing revenue by taxation.

In the committee the necessity was stressed of making this bond issue of over $3,000,000,000 very attractive by making the revenue for amortization very certain and sure.

In my opinion, you missed a very favorable opportunity of trying out your currency-inflation plan.

But let me say further that the problem before the Ways and Means Committee to provide revenue was not the only tax problem. Every one of the 10,000 subdivisions in the country who undertake public-works activity will immediately create a tax problem for themselves. So in addition to our own problems, there will be 10,000 new local problems of taxation to provide for payment of loans. If you Democrats are sincere in your contention that the inflation policy is sane, it seems to me that there should have been some recommendation for its use at this time, and save the necessity of producing revenue where the interest alone will cost $3,000,000 in the next 20 years.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will yield, the representatives of industry were very frank to state that they wanted the law in order that they might set up commodity agreements which now are under the ban.

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, let me say that I am in favor of that. If we can do what is sought under the bill, if we can bring capital and labor together in 100 percent agreement, it well deserves the encomiums and praise of all the American people. I am for that a hundred percent, and I believe it would be of great advantage to the social and economic development of the country.

Now, may I suggest in passing that while the purpose of the bill is to raise the "economic level" of this country by controlling and restricting domestic competition, there is no provision for the control or restriction of competing commodities made in foreign countries. Even under existing conditions the foreign nations are finding this a good country to sell in but a poor country to buy in.

With the increase in price levels that is hoped for as a result of the passage of this legislation, it will be a still better country for foreign nations to sell in. Bernard M. Baruch, head of the War Industries Board during the World War, spoke of this weakness in the bill and called attention to it in an address in Washington on May 19. He said:

> Finally this process is certain to raise American costs even further above world costs and to require additional protection against importations. Coupled with the further effect of the farm bill to raise prices, all this struggle suggests inconsistency in domestic policy with any plan to lower tariffs in the World Economic Conference.
> "But", he says, "that can be ironed out."

It will not be ironed out; there is no time to iron it out, no opportunity to propose an amendment. If I had an opportunity, I would offer section 8 of the Connery bill, which I insert at this point:

> To insure a purchasing power on the part of the American consumers the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, while this act continues in force and effect, to prohibit the entry of foreign-made goods, which goods are similar or comparable to goods produced in the United States of America, if such foreign-made goods are entered at total landed costs which are less than American cost of production of similar or comparable American-made goods. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make findings of the cost of production, and his decision shall be final.

Now, it is dangerous to make predictions. Somebody said that we ought not to be allowed to quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD after 30 days, because of consequent embarrassment to the Members.

I have been embarrassed about a prediction I made as to the return of prosperity after the passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. I have been taken to task on several occasions because of a prophecy in the making of which I was absolutely sincere.

But my Democratic friends made just as bad a prediction when they said that the Smoot-Hawley bill would cost the country billions of dollars, when as a matter of fact the prices came down so that they did not pay the cost of production.

There is no question but that the great body politic of the people are behind the President and behind this Congress. I sacrifice just as much of individual fundamentals and faith as does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] when I support the Democratic side of this proposition, especially when I have no opportunity to put in what I think would be a saving clause, because industry in this country will say to you and submit evidence to you that their policies and troubles are not all domestic troubles, but that their part time for labor and their necessity of reducing wages is a result of unfair foreign competition and that ought to be given consideration in this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CROWTHER. Under the granted privilege of extension of remarks I present a short description of the provisions of the bill.

H.R. 5755

This bill confers upon the President of the United States greater power than has ever been vested in an executive during our Nation's history. Title I of the bill attempts to complete what labor and capital have tried to accomplish for years with limited success, and that is, a hundred percent cooperation. This means wage agreements, regulation of the hours of labor, honest price and trade agreements, elimination of unfair competitive practices, and an end of cutthroat competition that has driven a multitude of small industries to the wall. During the life of this legislation all agreements, codes, and licenses are to be exempt from the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

Provision is made for the submission of voluntary trade agreements to the President which he may approve if clearly defined policies are made a part of the instrument. The exact language of the bill is:

> That such associations or groups shall impose no inequitable restrictions on admission to membership therein and are truly representative of such trades or industries or subdivisions thereof.
> Also—
> That such code or codes are not designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises and will not operate to discriminate against them.

Penalties are provided for violations of code procedure and such violation is termed a misdemeanor and the fine is $500 for each offense.

After public notice and hearing as he may specify, the President may license business enterprises in order to make effective these codes of fair competition or agreements. The President also has the power to revoke any such license or agreement, after due notice and opportunity for a hearing, for violations of the terms or conditions thereof. Penalties are also provided for attempts to carry on a business for which such license is required consisting of 6 months' imprisonment or a $500 fine, or both.

The Federal Trade Commission is to aid the President by making such investigations as may be necessary to enable him to carry out the provisions of this section of the act.

Before any code or agreement or license is approved it must contain the following conditions: It must provide that employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; that no employee or one seeking employment shall be compelled as a condition of employment to join any organization or to refrain from joining a labor organization of his own choosing; that employers shall comply with the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other working conditions approved or prescribed by the President.

The President is authorized, so far as practicable, to afford every opportunity to employers and employees to establish by mutual agreement standards of maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and such other working conditions as may be necessary.

When no such mutual agreement has been approved by the President, he may order an investigation of the labor practices, policies, wages, hours of labor, and so forth, and after such hearings as he deems advisable he is authorized to prescribe a limited code of fair competition, fixing the factors as heretofore mentioned.

The bill further provides for a great program of public works. The Administrator under the direction of the President is to prepare a comprehensive program, which is to include construction, repair, and improvement of public highways and parkways, public buildings and publicly owned instrumentalities and facilities, conservation and development of natural resources, control, utilization, and purification of waters, prevention of soil erosion, development of water power, transmission of electrical energy, and construction of river and harbor improvements. Low-cost housing is to be constructed under public regulations and slum clearance projects are to be taken care of. Such naval vessels and aircraft as do not conflict with the London Naval Treaty of 1930 are to be constructed.

The President is authorized to construct, finance, or aid in the construction or financing of any public-works project. He may also upon such terms as he shall prescribe make grants to States, municipalities, or other public bodies for construction, repair, or improvement of such projects, the grant being limited to 30 percent of the cost of labor and materials. Of course a grant is a gift.

Four hundred million dollars of the three billion and three hundred million is set aside for emergency construction of public highways and related projects. I offered an amendment providing that at least 400 million should be specifically provided to finish the Federal building program which would include the post offices at Schenectady and Amsterdam. The amendment was not accepted by the Committee but I am hopeful that these projects will be included in the general public-buildings provision.

No convict labor is to be employed in these projects, and all materials must be produced, mined, or manufactured in the United States.

Thirty hours of labor a week on public works is the limit prescribed, and where they are qualified preference is given to ex-service men with dependents.

The revenue necessary to amortize interest and sinking fund in the $3,300,000,000 bond issue amounts to $220,000,000 annually.

The committee adopted plan no. 1 presented by the Director of the Budget, consisting of a raise in normal income tax from 4 and 8 percent to 6 and 10. Dividends are also to be taxed, their former exemption being repealed. An additional Federal tax of three quarter cents a gallon on gasoline was also adopted. The income-tax raise is expected to yield 46 millions, the dividend tax 83 millions, and the gasoline tax 92 millions, a total of 221 millions.

The minority voted unanimously against this method of raising the revenue and so did one member of the majority. I cannot understand the prejudice against the sales tax. It is the fairest tax in the world, and the American Federation of Labor, through their leader, William Green, agreed to accept it although they have always opposed it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to a statement the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] just made with reference to the use of Treasury notes to meet these expenditures. His statement was that 70 percent of the $3,300,000,000 is to be secured and that thereby there was no necessity to issue bonds. Of course, I know that such expression was used inadvertently. As a matter of fact, the only portion secured is the 70 percent of loans made to municipalities, States, and different political subdivisions. The $400,000,000 that will go to road building, the money that will go into Federal construction, into river and harbor work, flood control, and scores of other activities to put the unemployed to work will not come within the 70-percent feature. Only the 70 percent of loans made to States or their subdivisions are secured.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER], who is a very capable Member of this Congress, knows that I have favored currency-expansion legislation. There are two reasons why I do not want to see Treasury notes meet these expenditures. One, that we must sell something like $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds, $1,900,000,000, to be exact, to refinance short-time paper within the next few weeks, and there is the question of the effect upon their market. There is another reason in my mind. I want to save the issuance of currency, with the hope in my heart that the World War veterans may be able to get that currency issued under the Owen plan in payment of their bonus certificates. [Applause.] We must have controlled inflation. I believed in it when it was unpopular. I believed it was the hope of our country when the payment of the bonus was before us. Time has justified that position. The power to have controlled inflation even without its exercise has started us well on the road to recovery.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COX. Was there anything in the way of the committee that prevented it from putting the bonus provision in the bill before the House?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Georgia, who has had quite an experience here, knows that we could have gone into the various realms of legislation. We could have taken the depreciated-currency legislation that the gentleman from New York wanted. We could have written a tariff act. We could have had a complete revenue bill. We could have presented some measures that might have a beneficial effect upon the cotton mills of Georgia, the gentleman's State. We could have brought in all kinds of legislation, but there are times for all things, and the purpose of this legislation is to put the unemployed to work. My distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. Cox] says that if this law passes, the turning point in this Nation's history will have been reached. I say to the distinguished gentleman that the turning point in our history has already been reached.

When this bill is passed by this House and it becomes law, it will place within the power of the President discretionary power to rear an economic structure that has collapsed and to build anew upon the ruins. The turning point has already been reached, and so far as the constitutional argument is concerned, the language of the great liberals in the Supreme Court recognizes that a new day has arrived. That day has arrived and a new deal is in course of consummation.

We have passed an agricultural bill increasing agricultural-commodity prices. Attached to that bill was the currency legislation which will mean so much to our country. This bill is a supplement of that legislation. This bill tends toward the employment of millions of unemployed. When it reaches the Supreme Court, it will be considered in the light of fair decisions and in the light of our present-day experience and conditions.

In discussing title I, I say that the powers granted there are discretionary. Further, the powers are temporary. The antitrust laws are not repealed. They are suspended insofar as they come in conflict with this law, for a temporary period, in order that an economic structure may be built. The gentleman from Georgia in a query to some gentleman endeavored to quote Mr. Richberg in answer to a gentleman on the committee that this bill was contemplated to construct monopolies, and he referred to page 60 of the hearings. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Richberg is the general counsel for the brotherhoods, and he had as much to do with the labor provisions in this bill, probably more, than any other man. He said they were fair to labor.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], let me quote from the bill:

That such code or codes are not designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises, and will not operate to discriminate against them, and will tend to effectuate the policy of this title.

My friends, it is an easy matter for a shrewd lawyer to pick out a particular sentence in a particular paragraph and stress it, but you must read the declaration of policy of this bill. You must read it. Every line in title I is to effectuate the purpose set forth in the preamble of that title, or its declaration of policy. It reads as follows:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. A national emergency productive of widespread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate commerce, affects the public welfare and undermines the standards of living of the American people is hereby declared to exist. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will be very happy to yield.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the language of Mr. Richberg, on page 56 of the hearings?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That was not the page to which the gentleman referred a moment ago.

Mr. COX. I know it was not; but I will come to that later. At the bottom of page 56 I find this:

It has been the desire of the trade associations, from the employers' standpoint, to be permitted to get together and make agreements establishing standards of fair competition—

And then later—

Agreements such as have been developed in a great many industries where they have attempted trade-association operations, for the purpose of eliminating unfair practices, and also, let us say, for the purpose of establishing price levels on which the industry felt it could survive. Of course, those agreements have run ahead on into the Sherman law and the other antitrust laws, because they tended to restrict competition, to restrain competition in interstate commerce.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman stops too soon. Now I want to read something on page 57 of the hearing, quoting from the same gentleman:

Now, the difficulty that is met in this bill is this: Any suggestion that the antitrust laws simply be repealed would turn us back, without Government restraint, into the field of developing monopoly and monopoly control of prices and output, which would be abhorrent to the general senses of the American people who, I think, still believe that a private monopoly is indefensible.

The very purpose of this bill, the foundation rock, is to prevent monopolies. Such purpose is expressly written into the law. Regardless of the desire of a particular trade group or industrial group as to what they might want to do, the law says that such code or codes are not designed to promote monopolies or limit or oppress small industry, and will not operate to discriminate against them, and will tend to effectuate the policy of this title. It is not contemplated to lay down a national code for all industries.

If you find an industry that a national code would fit, well and good; but throughout this bill you have it for a trade or industry or subdivision thereof. I asked Senator WAGNER what "subdivision" meant. I asked Mr. Douglas with reference to "restricted area or zone", and the testimony is, without contradiction, that these codes of agreement will apply to particular areas in the sections where conditions are different from the conditions in other sections. The question of locality and the question of skilled employees is specifically mentioned as an important factor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. COX. Industry wanted this bill because it permitted the setting up of a trade agreement. Now, will not that industry immediately fix prices, which defeats the normal operation of the law of competition, and is that not what industry wanted?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not agree that this is a price fixing bill as such. It is a bill that intends to put unemployed to work, to give them a living wage, to permit them to live as Americans should live; to permit a fair price to be secured for their commodities. You may have a voluntary code, my friends——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I regret very much, but my time is limited.

You may have a voluntary code. If an industry came in with a voluntary code, before that can become operative it must have the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In just a moment, please. Before you can have a voluntary code, those sending it must show two things, that there is no inequitable restriction on admissions to membership and that they are truly representative of the trades or industries involved. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. With reference to the constitutional construction of modifying the antitrust provision, did the committee have in mind the principles laid down in the recent case of Appalachian Coal Co. v. United States? It seems to me the gentleman might well incorporate a part of that decision in his remarks.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I, as one member of the committee, had that decision in mind. It affected my particular section. It may be said the Supreme Court went a long way in that opinion, but it shows the trend of the times, and it is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. In view of the fact that the Appalachian decision was favorable to the States of Kentucky and West Virginia what, in the gentleman's opinion, will this bill do to promote the coal industry of Ohio, to permit it to revive itself?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Well, I certainly think the industry in which the gentleman is interested will be helped. There is no difference in our opinion. We both believe that the coal industry will be revived. If we felt there was anything in this bill that would cripple the coal industry I am certain the gentleman from Ohio would not support it and I would not.

It is necessary for us to realize that this bill is aimed at national economic recovery. Even now the coal business in Kentucky and West Virginia is improving by leaps and bounds. The general economic condition is vastly improved. But, we must admit that such improvement must be helped along, steadied, and pushed forward by increased buying power. In my opinion, this is the legislation that will have maximum effect in starting the wheels of industry to turn permanently. Once started, they will naturally accelerate. With the factory wheels turning there will be a demand for coal, and this industry, at the lowest ebb in its history, will get upon its feet.

Take the coal industry for example: When there is a demand for coal caused by the wheels of industry turning every individual in the immediate and surrounding vicinity of the mines is directly benefited; buying power is created; money and credit change hands; increase in the velocity of currency takes place, not only in the immediate vicinity but the purchases necessary for this work reach every State in the Union and the labor in those States. They have increased buying power; they go into the market; other men and women are put to work—they have increased buying power. Throughout this entire country people are able to buy the products of the farmer at a fair price. This gives them increased buying power. In turn, they purchase the products of the factory and the mines—this gives them added buying power, and so on until our people will be a prosperous, contented people.

Now, I want to submit one fact that has not been developed, and that is with reference to the consumer. He gets into this picture. The consumer has a representative in this deal. The representative of the consumer is the President of the United States.

Mr. COX. Oh, he is the representative of all the people.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He is the representative of the people in respect to these agreements and these codes. The code or agreement must be a fair code or agreement, and this bill gives the President the power, as a condition of his approval, to impose such conditions and include such requirements for the making of reports, the keeping of accounts, and so forth, for the protection of consumers, competitors, employees, and others.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman not permit me to take him back again to the testimony of Mr. Richberg for a moment?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I can not yield further. My time is very limited.

In paragraph (d), on page 4, power is given the President to create an involuntary code, and then later on in the bill he has a right to prescribe a limited code, a code that only deals with the question of hours, the question of minimum pay, and working conditions in the industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] 5 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The statement has been made that this is a manufactured bill, a canned bill. Since I have been in Congress I have had something to do with bringing out many bills. I have never seen a bill that has been amended as many times or given more careful consideration than this particular bill.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will yield, with the exception of the tax provision, the original bill as sent down to the committee has not suffered the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, my! I can understand now the vision of the gentleman if that is the consideration he has given to this bill.

Mr. COX. I have copies of both bills and have compared them very carefully.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There was a committee print. I think I can see the viewpoint of the gentleman. He is honestly mistaken. After we concluded our work a new bill was introduced. It was used as the basis for discussion in committee. I can point out between 30 and 50 amendments to the original bill, which was later reintroduced by Chairman DOUGHTON, of the Ways and Means Committee, as amended by the committee; and, of course, the gentleman from Georgia did not know about that. He did not know the changes the committee has made in respect of the original bill.

Mr. COX. I have studied both bills. I dare say I have studied them more carefully and closely than the gentleman if the gentleman's statement means to reflect his understanding of the two bills.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I mean that I can point out probably 50 changes made by the Ways and Means Committee in the original bill introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made that the income tax on incomes above $10,000 has been increased only 3 percent. I am sure the gentleman who made that statement was sincere; but when you get to juggling figures, things are not always made to appear in their true relationship. Let me tell you what this increase is. There may be just complaint as to the burden or as to the excessiveness of the increase, but certainly none as to its lightness of burden. They talk about a 50-percent increase on $4,000 net income. That is true; but when you get above $4,000 net income the increase is 25 percent on the normal rate. It is increased from 8 percent to 10 percent. This is carried not only from $4,000 to $10,000, but it goes from $4,000 to the maximum figure, even though it should be $50,000. In other words, the normal rate is increased 25 percent on all incomes over $4,000.

Do not forget we have a surtax, and in the high brackets this rate is 55 percent. When you add the normal rate of 10 percent to the surtax you have a Federal tax of 65 percent of the income. If you live in Wisconsin, you would have to pay 15 percent as a State income tax, which would make a total tax of 80 percent of such income of a person as may fall in the highest bracket.

I wish to call attention to a committee amendment which will be offered. It is a provision to eliminate net losses. This was a provision which was incorporated in the Revenue Act of 1932 that passed the House. The Senate took it out. Before the act of 1932 you could carry losses over for a period of 2 years. In other words, as Mr. Morgan had a severe loss in 1929 he was entitled to carry over the loss he sustained in 1929 and offset it against income which was earned in 1930 and 1931. This amendment meets that situation. This amendment eliminates the carry-over for 2 years. It eliminates the carry-over for 1 year. The committee amendment which is to be offered provides that the loss must be taken in the year in which it was sustained, and this certainly is a salutary provision. I am happy in having sponsored this in the last Congress even before the Morgan exposé.

Another committee amendment will be offered to put the tax on electric energy on the producer instead of the consumer, in conformity with the action of the House taken a few days ago. We are controlled by the action of the House in this respect.

A number of other committee amendments will be offered, probably a dozen. It may be the gentleman from Georgia did not know about them.

Mr. COX. Yes; I knew about them because a member of the committee made the statement yesterday that he proposed to do that, and the statement was made as an inducement to the House to adopt the rule, which was adopted, under which this bill is being considered.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not want to be misunderstood in referring to the committee amendments that are to be introduced. The amendments to which I referred originally are amendments to the original Doughton bill in addition to those offered upon the floor today, and there are, I would say, at least 30 such amendments.

This bill has been referred to as creating a dictatorship in this country. I do not believe it goes that far; but with twelve or fourteen millions of our people out of work, with millions and hundreds of millions of dollars of Federal money, State money, county and city money being expended to provide a mere living to millions of our citizens, it is high time work of this character were done that tends toward the employment of our people.

We may prate about the Constitution of the United States. No man loves it more than I do. Constitutionality is a personal consideration. However, I believe that the law of self-preservation, the first law of nature, will have its effect in the consideration of the constitutionality of this or any similar bill. [Applause.]

Justice Brandeis' language in minority opinion in New State Ice Co. against Liebmann is very illuminating in this respect:

The people of the United States are now confronted with an emergency more serious than war. Misery is widespread in a time, not of scarcity but of overabundance. The long-continued depression has brought unprecedented unemployment, a catastrophic fall in commodity prices, and a volume of economic losses which threatens our financial institutions. Some people believe that the existing conditions threaten even the stability of the capitalistic system. Economists are searching for the causes of this disorder and are reexamining the base of our industrial structure. Business men are seeking possible remedies. Most of them realize that failure to distribute widely the profits of industry has been a prime cause of our present plight. But rightly or wrongly, many persons think that one of the major contributing causes has been unbridled competition. Increasingly, doubt is expressed whether it is economically wise or morally right that men should be permitted to add to the producing facilities of an industry which is already suffering from overcapacity. In justification of that doubt men point to the excess capacity of our productive facilities resulting from their vast expansion without corresponding increase in the consumptive capacity of the people. They assert that through improved methods of manufacture, made possible by advances in science and invention and vast accumulation of capital, our industries had become capable of producing from 30 to 100 percent more than was consumed even in days of vaunted prosperity; and that the present capacity will, for a long time, exceed the needs of business. All agree that irregularity in employment—the greatest of our evils—cannot be overcome unless production and consumption are more nearly balanced. Many insist there must be some form of economic control. There are plans for proration. There are many plans for stabilization. And some thoughtful men of wide business experience insist that all projects for stabilization and proration must prove futil unless, in some way, the equivalent of the certificate of public convenience and necessity is made a prerequisite to embarking new capital in an industry in which the capacity already exceeds the production schedules. Whether that view is sound nobody knows.

The objections to the proposal are obvious and grave. The remedy might bring evils worse than the present disease. The obstacles to success seem insuperable. The economic and social sciences are largely uncharted seas. We have been none too successful in the modest essays in economic control already entered upon. The new proposal involves a vast extension of the area of control. Merely to acquire the knowledge essential as a basis for the exercise of this multitude of judgments would be a formidable task; and each of the thousands of these judgments would call for some measure of prophecy. Even more serious are the obstacles to success inherent in the demands which execution of the project would make upon human intelligence and upon the character of men. Man is weak and his judgment at best is fallible.

Yet the advances in the exact sciences and the achievements in invention remind us that the seemingly impossible sometimes happens. There are men now living who were in the habit of using the age-old expression, "It is as impossible as flying." The discoveries in physical science, the triumphs in invention attest the value of the process of trial and error. In large measure, these advances have been due to experimentation. In those fields experimentation has, for 2 centuries, been not only free but encouraged. Some people assert that our present plight is due, in part, to the limitations set by courts upon experimentation in the fields of social and economic science and to the discouragement to which proposals for betterment there have been subjected otherwise. There must be power in the States and the Nation to remold through experimentation our economic practices and institutions to meet changing social and economic needs. I cannot believe that the framers of the fourteenth amendment, or the States which ratified it, intended to deprive us of the power to correct the evils of technological unemployment and excess productive capacity which have attended progress in the useful arts.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I draw attention to my insertion in my remarks of a typical code of practice that might be used by any typical trade association within the purview of title I of this act, and I ask unanimous consent to insert this in the RECORD.

Mr. CROWTHER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, has this been submitted to the "brain trust"?

Mr. CELLER. I am the "brain trust" in this regard. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LAMNECK). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] complains about the vast powers conferred upon the President by title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

However, these powers are no greater, nor any less, than those granted to the head of the War Industries Board in 1918. Incidentally, President Wilson took it upon himself to set up the War Industries Board by a mere letter addressed to Bernard M. Baruch, under date of March 4, 1918. The letter constituted the charter of the Board. The set-up of the Board was not even grounded in legislation. The letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 4, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. BARUCH: I am writing to ask if you will not accept appointment as Chairman of the War Industries Board, and I am going to take the liberty at the same time of outlining the functions, the constitution, and action of the Board as I think they should now be established.

The functions of the Board should be:

(1) The creation of new facilities and the disclosing, if necessary, the opening-up of new or additional sources of supply;

(2) The conversion of existing facilities, where necessary, to new uses;

(3) The studious conservation of resources and facilities by scientific, commercial, and industrial economies;

(4) Advice to the several purchasing agencies of the Government with regard to the prices to be paid;

(5) The determination, wherever necessary, of priorities of production and of delivery and of the proportions of any given article to be made immediately accessible to the several purchasing agencies when the supply of that article is insufficient, either temporarily or permanently;

(6) The making of purchases for the Allies.

The Board should be constituted as at present, and should retain, so far as necessary and so far as consistent with the character and purposes of the reorganization, its present advisory agencies; but the ultimate decision of all questions, except the determination of prices, should rest always with the chairman, the other members acting in a cooperative and advisory capacity. The further organization of advice I will indicate below.

In the determination of priorities of production, when it is not possible to have the full supply of any article that is needed produced at once, the chairman should be assisted and, so far as practicable, guided by the present priorities organization or its equivalent.

In the determination of priorities of delivery, when they must be determined, he should be assisted when necessary, in addition to the present advisory priorities organization, by the advice and cooperation of a committee constituted for the purpose and consisting of official representatives of the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Railway Administration, the Shipping Board, and the War Trade Board in order that when a priority of delivery has been determined there may be common, consistent, and concerted action to carry it into effect.

In the determination of prices the chairman should be governed by the advice of a committee consisting, besides himself, of the members of the Board immediately charged with the study of raw materials and of manufactured products, of the labor member of the Board, of the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, and the Fuel Administrator.

The chairman should be constantly and systematically informed of all contracts, purchases, and deliveries in order that he may have always before him a schematized analysis of the progress of business in the several supply divisions of the Government in all departments.

The duties of the chairman are:

(1) To act for the joint and several benefits of all the supply departments of the Government.

(2) To let alone what is being successfully done and interfere as little as possible with the present normal processes of purchase and delivery in the several departments.

(3) To guide and assist wherever the need for guidance or assistance may be revealed; for example, in the allocation of contracts, in obtaining access to materials in any way preempted, or in the disclosure of sources of supply.

(4) To determine what is to be done when there is any competitive or other conflict of interest between departments in the matter of supplies; for example, when there is not a sufficient immediate supply for all and there must be a decision as to priority of need or delivery, or when there is competition for the same source of manufacture or supply, or when contracts have not been placed in such a way as to get advantage of the full productive capacity of the country.

(5) To see that contracts and deliveries are followed up where such assistance as is indicated under (3) and (4) above has proved to be necessary.

(6) To anticipate the prospective needs of the several supply departments of the Government and their feasible adjustment to the industry of the country as far in advance as possible, in order that as definite an outlook and opportunity for planning as possible may be afforded the business men of the country.

In brief, he should act as the general eye of all supply departments in the field of industry.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

MR. BERNARD M. BARUCH,
Washington, D.C.

Briefer than the letter was the Executive order, under the so-called "Overman Act", which ratified the existing status of the War Industries Board. That Executive order reads as follows:

I hereby establish the War Industries Board as a separate administrative agency to act for me and under my direction. * * * The functions, duties, and powers of the War Industries Board, as outlined in my letter of March 4, 1918, to Bernard M. Baruch, Esq., its chairman, shall be, and hereby are, continued in full force and effect.

It may be said, and has been said, that that was a time of war; that we are now in a time of peace. That is hardly true. Judge Brandeis, in a famous dissenting opinion (New State Ice Co. v. Liebman, 285 U.S.Repts. 306) says:

The people of the United States are now confronted with an emergency more serious than war. Misery is wide-spread in a time, not of scarcity but of overabundance. The long-continued depression has brought unprecedented unemployment, a catastrophic fall in commodity prices, and a volume of economic loss which threatens our financial institutions. Thus, emergencies of peace may be just as acute and damaging as those of war.

I say to Mr. BECK, the War Industries Board did not injure the Constitution nor will the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Much has been said about the possibility of the Supreme Court's declaring title I unconstitutional. The Supreme Court, which declared the emergency rent laws constitutional, will certainly declare title I of this act constitutional. Marcus Brown Holding Co. v. Feldman (456 U.S. 170), which arose in New York City, and Block v. Hirsh (256 U.S. 135), which arose in the city of Washington, took away the right of landlords to charge anything that they would for leases on residential property. This right was denied to the landlords on the ground of the scarcity of buildings and dwellings. A very recent Supreme Court case, the Appalachian Coal case, should still all ideas that the Court will declare this bill, if enacted, unconstitutional. There 70 percent of coal operators combined to form a selling agency. It really was and is an agreement to fix prices and limit production. This bill would permit just that.

However, even the minds of the members of the Supreme Court are not static; they move onward. They realize, or ought to realize, that the Court should not have the right to place a bar upon experimentation in the fields of social and economic science. As Judge Brandeis said in the dissenting opinion above, in the case of the New State Ice Co. against Liebman, at 311:

There must be power in the States and the Nation to remold, through experimentation, our economic practices and institutions to meet changing social and economic needs. I cannot believe that the framers of the fourteenth amendment, or the States which ratified it, intended to deprive us of the power to correct the evils of technological unemployment and excess productive capacity which have attended progress in the useful arts.

The judge cautioned the court that to stay experimentation in things social and economic was the gravest of responsibilities, and denial of the right to experiment might be fraught with serious consequences to the Nation.

Title I of the instant bill is a great experimentation. It is really the declaration of independence of industry; independence from the age-worn shackles of the antitrust laws.

Recently two men came to my office in New York, and with serious demeanor, asked me to close the door to my office and draw the window blinds. They wanted to speak to me in the utmost secrecy. In whispering tones they told me they represented a large manufactory and that there were five such manufactories, the proprietors of whom were members of a trade organization. They have for 2 years past been agreeing upon certain practices in the trade, including that of price fixing. They wished to know their rights under the pending bill and whether they were safe from prosecution as the result of their price-fixing arrangements for the past 2 years. I told them that if this bill were passed, they could enter into a code of practice in their industry whereby they could limit production, allocate production, fix prices, set minimum hours of employment, arrange wage scales, and exchange credit facilities; in fact, do anything that would further the best interests of the industry, provided these practices were fair and equitable to the public, to labor, and to themselves, and would not offend against the policy of the act, as found in section I, title I, of the instant bill; said declaration of policy being as follows:

TITLE I—INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. A national emergency productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people, is hereby declared to exist. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof; and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practice, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources.

My good friends in my office breathed a sigh of relief and seemed especially happy when I told them that if this bill were passed they could freely and openly do what they had heretofore been doing by indirection and clandestinely.

That, my good friends, is the nub of the situation. Many trade organizations, stealthily and behind closed doors, have been making all kinds and manner of agreements as to wage conditions, prices, and credit facilities. The preservation of the life of their business demanded this. The antitrust laws have been violated right and left. No law of Congress can stop economic law. The changing economic law requires a changed statute.

It is becoming more and more evident that blind competition, with its ruinous cutthroat prices, is strangling industry by causing the widest kind of fluctuation in supply and demand, as well as uttermost waste and cruel unemployment. As Robert S. Brookings so wisely said recently, our problem is to work out some method by which we may obtain the benefits of competition with as little as possible of accompanying disorganization. "We know from sad experience that blind, ignorant competition has failed to make its reasonable contribution to earnings and our national economic needs." Industrialists must be permitted to band together and put their houses in order, and arrange fair equitable codes of practice governing the industry.

It would be unfair to attribute our present economic distress to the Sherman law. However, no sensible man can ignore the fact that the Sherman law and the interpretations placed upon it by our Supreme Court is one of the causes of that distress. Instead of being an aid to business it has become a hindrance. The Sherman law is called "An act to protect trade and commerce." It has been converted into a statute to injure and cripple trade and commerce. Appropriate economic planning that the economists have been advocating, and for which forward-looking business men have been yearning, is impossible under the Sherman law.

The law has been interpreted by the Supreme Court as an act to insure business against restraint, and by that token has become a law that forces competition in committing wastes. The Sherman law originated in the abuses brought about by the creation of so-called "trusts" and "monopolies" during the last 2 decades of the last century. These monopolies were a result of the fierce individualism that seemed to dominate during these decades. It is still sound law to prevent monopolies; and if the Supreme Court interpretations of the Sherman law had been limited to the prevention of monopolies and trusts, there would be no need today for this pending statute. But the Supreme Court went further than the sponsors of the Sherman law intended. Senator Sherman said that he aimed at "substantial monopoly, injurious to the public."

Chief Justice Fuller, in 1895, pointed out that all the law did was to strike at combinations, contracts, and conspiracies to monopolize trade and commerce. No one wishes to repeal the Sherman law so far as it obtains against monopolies, but its development and interpretation and the uncertainties of its application have given the statute a scope and effect far beyond real beneficial results. In other words, the Supreme Court has developed the statute far beyond its original purpose. Therein lies the difficulty. The Supreme Court failed to distinguish between a conspiracy and a combination. It held all combinations to be conspiracies. Innocent combinations were confounded with guilty combinations. As a result natural and fair and equitable agreements among members of the same industry, to avoid overproduction and wastes and destructive competition, were forbidden. The instant bill seeks to bring the statute back to the common law and permit combinations, provided they do not monopolize, or tend to monopolize, and provided same are fair and equitable.

It was never within the realm of the common law to prevent combinations or agreements among tradesmen. The common law only prohibited combination when that combination became a conspiracy to monopolize or an agreement to oppress. The Supreme Court failed to follow this common law. It seemed to think it had a mandate under the Sherman law to hold that any restraint of trade was bad and that all competition is good.

It is said that we turned the hands of the clock backward 5 centuries when the Supreme Court made such a pronouncement.

Great havoc was caused by the Northern Securities case in 1903 when the Supreme Court, by a 5-to-4 decision, announced the principle that no mutual restraints were permissible; that same were prohibited by the Sherman law. Had the minority view in the Northern Securities case prevailed, there would have been no need now to amend the Sherman law. Furthermore, the views of the minority in that case were quite consistent with the well-established principles of the common law.

It is interesting to note that Justice Holmes, one of the minority, pointed out that if the competition with third parties is not restrained or oppression practiced against them, or if monopoly is not aimed at or achieved, then no aspect of the combination can be harmful. "Quite to the contrary", said Holes, "such combinations might easily be beneficial to the public interests." He went on further to say that all trade agreements that aimed at the elimination of excess production or the maintenance of fair prices must be deemed legal.

Title I of the instant bill imports and permits exactly what Justice Holmes said in his dissenting opinion in the Northern Securities case. Title I says that, with the approval of the President, or anyone he may designate, any trade organization can enter into an agreement among its members to eliminate excess production and maintain fair prices.

If we look at the language of the Sherman Act—

Justice Holmes said—

it says nothing about competition. It deals with restraints of trade and with monopoly. There was no objection at the common law to combinations in restraint of trade, unless they amounted to monopoly, or unless they intended to oppress or restrain strangers to the combination. The prohibitions of the Sherman law were suggested by the trusts, the objection to which, as everyone knows, was not the union of former competitors, but the sinister power exercised or supposed to be exercised by the combination in keeping rivals out of business and ruining those who were already in. * * * It was the ferocious extreme of competition with others, not the cessation of competition among the parties, that was the evil feared.

The Sherman Act has been interpreted dozens and dozens of times, and each time it has been interpreted differently. In fact, the meaning of this statute rests on so much uncertainty that I think I am almost safe in assuming that no two judges anywhere can agree as to its proper meaning. After 40 years of hairsplitting, the judges of our Supreme Court are all still in disagreement. In the Freight Association and Joint Traffic Association cases, 1897 and 1898, a divided court held the act applicable to all restraints, whether reasonable or not.

In the Northern Securities case in 1903, a divided court said the act went beyond the common law and held that all restraints, whether monopolistic or not, were banned. Eight years later, in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, a divided court held that reasonable restraints were not within the ban of the statute. Nine years later, in 1920, in the Steel case, four judges considered the public interest and the beneficial economic effects and held that the agreement, if in the public interest and benefit, was valid. Three judges dissented and said they were—unable to see that public policy or the assumed disastrous effect upon foreign trade of dissolving the unlawful combination is sufficient to entitle it to immunity from the enforcement of the statute.

In the Shoe Machinery case, 1918, four justices held that the statute applied to so-called "tying" contracts under patents. Three held a contrary view. In the Beechnut Packing Co. case, in 1922, five justices held a plan for resale of defendant's products illegal. Four justices said the statute had nothing to do with the case. In 1924, in the Leather Workers case, the courts disagreed as to what constitutes interstate commerce under the law. In the Maple Flooring and Cement cases, in 1925, by a vote of 6 to 3, it was held that the public interest must always be considered in passing upon a combination that tended to stabilize trade and industry and produce fair price levels and to avoid the wastes which attend unintelligent conduct of enterprises. The minority in that case said:

We may confidently expect the destruction of that kind of competition, long relied upon by the public for the establishment of fair prices, and to preserve which the Antitrust Act was passed.

The American Column and Lumber case, in 121, was a case where the court held that an association for the mere exchange of information was illegal under the Sherman law. Justice Holmes, however, for the minority, said that a combination merely to get knowledge and information about the trade was certainly not illegal. In the Trenton Potteries case five judges held that agreements to fix prices were not reasonable restraints of trade, and therefore were illegal. Three justices dissented. These three justices perhaps were realists and knew that the trade organizations do not usually reduce their agreements to writing or to any formalities, but rather rely upon what are known as "gentlemen's agreements." These agreements might well be called "bootlegging" agreements. They are without the law but are resorted to because of the law.

Not even the so-called "rule of reason", as laid down in the Standard Oil case, has rescued the statute from uncertainty. In fact, it has created more uncertainty. It is an indefinite and clouded standard. One can read and reread the 16,000 words of the Tobacco Trust and the Standard Oil decisions and not be able to form even a vague idea of what is meant by "reasonable" or "unreasonable" restraint. It is manifest that if the Supreme Court cannot give a plain definition of what a business man may or may not do, then certainly it is cruel and barbarous to charge the business man with violation of a law which is so ambiguous and uncertain in meaning. The business man, therefore, is entitled to have the law made clear. This bill does just that.

Is it not time, therefore, to change the act and allow these combinations, provided they be just and equitable, even though they do fix prices and adjust labor conditions and involve exchange of credit information? It is a fallacy to say that the law of supply and demand must have full sway. The fact is that free competition and the unhampered law of supply and demand has forced prices below the cost of production. This has driven men out of business, with consequent increase of unemployment and reduction of consumption demand. All this in turn has developed the dangerous spiral leading to our economic distress.

Let there be trade agreements to lift up commodity prices. It has been said that agreements under the bill cannot be made to fix a fair price. This is not so. If it were so, the bill would not be worth a tinker's dam. If the tanner can make the leather out of the hide with a profit, and the shoe manufacturer knows that he can make a fair return in the manufacturing of shoes out of that leather, and the wholesale distributor and retailer can sell the shoes at a profit, and the bankers are willing to extend credit facilities to finance these operations, then wages will increase, more jobs will be afforded, and in turn there will be a greater consumption demand. Only with increase of commodity prices and the destruction of overproduction and the doing-away with cut-throat competition will this be brought about. The codes of practice and the agreements indicated under title I will bring about this result. The combinations involved in these agreements will be under strict Government regulation. There will be no monopoly. There should be no abuses.

Furthermore, the bill has a duration of 2 years. If it works well, it can and will be extended indefinitely.

In preparation for my remarks on this bill I have been in touch with Mr. Junkin, of the Commercial Law Division, and Mr. Judkins of the Trade Association Section of the Department of Commerce. They have given me valuable assistance and have submitted to me what has been called a "Magna Carta" for trade associations. This document is to be credited to these two gentlemen as well as to Mr. Feiker, Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and to his assistant, Mr. Dewey, as well as to other distinguished gentlemen of the Department of Commerce. Because of the interests involved in this act throughout the business world, and because many lawyers will be wrestling with the problem of such trade organizations, I herewith submit a typical charter for a typical trade organization, contemplated under title I of the act:

PREAMBLE

Whereas in the past the economic and industrial development of this country has been predicated upon the principle of independence within the industry and independence of the industry in relationship to other groups; and

Whereas at the present time, increasing experience and wider vision indicate the fundamental interdependence of industry not only within the industry, but with all groups in the social fabric:

Therefore, we the (blank) industry do hereby organize and create the (blank) trade association, for the mutual benefit and advantage of those employed by it, of those engaged in allied industries, of those supplying our materials, of those distributing our output, of those consuming our products, and of all those interested in the development, improvement, and betterment of our methods, and in our place in the social and economic organization of the Nation—all in pursuance of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

ARTICLE I—MEMBERSHIP

This association, recognizing the interest of other groups in the prosperity, welfare, development, and conduct of the (blank) industry, and desiring the cooperation, the benefit of thought and research, and the suggestions of all those interested in that interdependent structure which affect the welfare of those engaged in this industry, hereby creates the following types of membership:

Active membership: Any individual, firm, or corporation in the group is eligible to become an active member of this association.

Cooperative membership: Any individual, firm, corporation, or organization engaged in related lines, suppliers, distributors, service bodies, scientific groups, representative of other trade, scientific or service bodies, or representative of labor, or consumers is eligible to this form of membership and may enjoy the facilities of the secretary's office in the promotion of matters of mutual interest, the privilege of the floor at open sessions, may be assigned to committees, or, if deemed desirable, may even be elected to office, but shall not have the privilege of voting.

Associate membership: Any individual, firm, corporation, or organization members of either of the above classes of membership may enter one or more associates who by virtue of certain qualifications in the scientific service, promotion, legal or social fields may be in a position to further the activities and objectives of the association, but privileges of this group are to be no greater than those set forth in the cooperative membership group.

ARTICLE II—ECONOMIC OBJECTIVES

Whereas the welfare and development of an industry depend upon its stable progress and its planned and proper growth, its limitation of production to consumer demands; and

Whereas the interest of those dependent upon or connected with the industry is vitally intertwined with the accomplishment of this purpose;

Now, therefore, this association shall have for its basic purpose a broad vision not only of its own interests, but the interest of those dependent upon it, catering to it, or dealing with it; and for this purpose this association shall study, investigate, and make research into all those factors which may affect its economic stability, growth, prosperity, and welfare.

For example:

1. Economic planning by the association: (a) Model plan for individual firm; (b) model plan for the entire industry; (c) model plan for interrelated industries.

2. Economic planning in its broadest aspects, cooperating with other trade and professional groups and the Government in "national economic planning."

3. Preparing surveys as to: (a) Seasonal fluctuations affecting sales product; (b) cyclical fluctuations, etc.

4. Preparing surveys as to the long-term trends of practices in: (a) Production and the prevention of overproduction and its reasonable limitation to consumer demand as well as allocation of production among members of the industry; (b) capital-goods investments; (c) marketing; (d) transportation; (e) labor and personnel problems; (f) trade practices and ethical standards; (g) changes in consumer needs and demands and regulation of production in accordance therewith.

5. Statistical activities (to further planning possibilities)—

A. Current statistics of production or trade: (a) Capacity; (b) purchases; (c) production; (d) stocks on hand; (e) orders, unfilled; (f) cancelations; (g) shipments; (h) prices; (i) returned goods; (j) inquiries; (k) bids; (l) contracts.

B. Labor statistics: (a) Number employed; (b) pay rolls; (c) personnel training.

C. Management or cost statistics: (a) Uniform cost accounting (classification of accounts); (b) cost estimating; (c) standard forms for orders, bills, bids, contracts, etc.; (d) cost studies of, 1, budget; 2, overheading; 3, production; 4, depreciation; 5, obsolescence; 6, shipping; 7, turnover; 8, stock or inventory control; 9, maintenance of a research library and laboratory.

D. Forecasting research as to sales possibilities: (a) Consumer needs, potential purchasing power, relation of competing products and possibilities of acceleration by advertising programs; (b) based on new inventions in production equipment, etc; (c) based on equipment expansion.

E. Research into cooperative buying or bulk quantity commitment.

ARTICLE III. BUSINESS OBJECTIVES

Whereas an industry which does not render true service to the public, or an industry which is without true profit to itself, must eventually face elimination.

Now, therefore, this association shall have for its immediate purpose the conduct of activities looking toward the betterment of its product, the elimination of wasteful practices, the promotion of high standards of practice, the making of fair and equitable agreements as to prices, the development of public confidence, and the dissemination of knowledge about the industry's products—their usefulness and place in the economic scheme—all in the interests of the public welfare, the industry, and labor.

For example:

1. Cooperative advertising of products to: (a) Manufacturers and distributors in this and related industries; (b) professional advisers (as architects, engineers, etc.); (c) the consumer.

2. Market research: (a) Discovering and defining logical market areas of each product; (b) determining probable long-term market growth factors; (c) determining normal seasonal fluctuations in sale and consumption; (d) determining the responsiveness in sale of each product to the business cycle influences.

3. Product research: (a) As to materials now used; (b) as to new materials; (c) as to new or improved products; (d) as to new uses for present products.

4. Industrial standardization: (a) Standard specifications for raw and semiprocessed materials; (b) standard specifications for equipment and supplies purchased; (c) sponorship of standards for articles produced promoting uniformity and interchangeability of parts; (d) trade association certification service ("Standard quality") and quality trade-mark.

5. Simplified practice.

6. Operation research: (a) Regarding equipment now used; (b) regarding contemplated new equipment; (c) regarding contemplated manufacturing methods; (d) regarding contemplated new utilization of by-products or waste materials.

7. Credit activities: A. Establishment of a credit bureau to—(a) Operate within the association; (b) cooperate with other associations; (c) cooperate with commercial credit agencies. B. Establishment of a collection-bureau service.

8. Transportation problems: (a) Establishment of a traffic department, concerned with rates and classification matters; (b) cooperation with Regional Joint Advisory Boards; (c) clarification of overseas shipping problems; (d) improvement of transportation facilities.

9. Insurance problems: (a) Securing equitable rates and uniform schedules; (b) securing more adequate coverage or protection; (c) studying feasibility of cooperative insurance arrangements; (d) acting as insurance service bureau for members.

10. Cooperative deliveries.

11. Cooperative warehousing.

12. Price fixing: (a) The gathering of data so that fair and equitable agreements can be made to reach fair price standards provided same be in the interests of the industry, the public, and labor, and provided further that such agreements will not monopolize or tend to monopolize the industry, and provided further that such agreements be in conformity with the letter and spirit of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

ARTICLE IV. SOCIAL OBJECTIVES

Whereas the economic future and progress of industry are predicated upon the welfare, health, safety, economic independence, and freedom from uncertainty of those without whose services the industry could not exist:

Now, therefore, this association shall have for its third purpose the study and formulation of the needs, and plans for meeting the needs, of those engaged in this industry, whether management or labor or production or distribution.

For example:

1. Stabilization of employment: (a) Employment surveys as to wages, hours, personnel, efficiency, adaptability, etc.; (b) placement service; (c) cooperation with public or private employment agencies.
2. Unemployment insurance.
3. Employee retirement plans.
4. Training schools for employees: (a) For apprentices, manual workers, foremen, salaried workers, salesmen, and executives.
5. Living and working conditions: (a) Health, hygiene, and welfare provisions; (b) plant sanitation; (c) hospital and medical care; (d) employee recreation.
6. Employee safety plans: (a) Safety campaigns or contests; (b) first-aid instruction.
7. Savings funds and stock-purchase plans.
8. Encouragement of conciliation and arbitration in disputes or misunderstandings with employees.
9. Woman and child labor policies.
10. Public relations: (a) Press contact; (b) Government contact (local, State, and Federal); (c) public participation in problems of trade; (d) educational projects, tributes to industrial or social leaders, etc.; (e) public information bureaus; (f) advertising, etc.

ARTICLE V. LEGAL OBJECTIVES

Whereas new laws affect industry; and

Whereas new industries and new relationships with industries result in laws; and

Whereas it is to the interest of this industry, in seeking to abide by existing laws, to have a proper voice in the development of those new laws which may affect this industry directly, or in its relationship to others:

Now, therefore, this association shall have for its fourth purpose the study of pertinent laws, the dissemination of information concerning them, and the formulation or criticism of those proposed projects which may concern it, and the development of those activities, functions, and purposes which may properly be within its scope. And this association will always conduct itself consistent with the policy announced in section 1, title I, of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which is as follows:

TITLE I—INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. A national emergency productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people, is hereby declared to exist. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof; and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources.

For example:

1. Objectives as to existing laws to: (a) Study and determine legal means to further all major and minor objectives; (b) make available information concerning laws and decisions; (c) perform service in litigation involving association policy; (d) assist in relations with governmental regulatory bodies; (e) standardize or improve forms and terminology of commercial and legal documents, etc., peculiar to trade; (f) defend the legality and propriety of the association's established trade practices; (g) encourage the use of commercial arbitration settling when best suited in misunderstandings or disputes.
2. Objectives as to proposed legislation to: (a) Keep posted on all legislative proposals, State and Federal, affecting the industry and related industries, (1) supply of raw materials, (2) transportation, (3) communication, (4) production control, (5) etc.; (b) initiate desirable legislative reforms; (c) promote uniformity of State legislation, etc.

In conclusion, I want to take this opportunity to give credit where credit is due. I desire to draw your attention to the fact that the real author of the original National Industrial Recovery Act is Hon. Meyer Jacobstein, former Representative in Congress from Rochester, N.Y. I worked with him on this bill many months ago; he has collaborated with Dr. Harold G. Moulton of the Brookings Institution of Washington, and he was one of the first to draw the President's attention to the efficacy of such an act. It was he who sold the idea to the President. Unfortunately, he has been shunted out of the picture. Of course, Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER has done yeoman service and deserves great credit, as does furthermore, Mr. Lewis Douglas, Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who, despite his multifarious duties, has contributed much to the final fashioning of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, the national industrial recovery bill puts into concrete form a new social and economic philosophy. It appears that for the first time the Congress of the United States is asked to recognize the joint state of capital and labor in the prosperity of the Nation. Too often in the past groups of men have held that wages were a necessary evil and were to be kept down to the lowest possible level. They were a charge on industry and hence retarded business and commerce. On the other hand, many employees have felt that private corporations had little right to a reasonable profit; that the country could be prosperous if wages were high regardless of the condition of the various private enterprises.

Ladies and gentlemen, this bill recognizes the inescapable fact that durable prosperity is predicated upon the well-being of both employer and employee.

Under title I of this bill, the employer is protected from ruthless competition—the kind of competition that is one of the causes of the sweatshop. This will make it possible for him to join with decent members of his trade in setting a reasonable price for his product. The old philosophy of laissez faire is abolished by this bill. That philosophy brought neither large profits to the employer nor decent living conditions and a living wage to the employee. We can well be rid of it.

In a sense this bill is a magna carta for labor. Labor is given the right to a minimum wage, decent working conditions, and reasonable hours of work. If a trade cannot agree upon such humane and decent standards, the President is authorized to refuse to license such a business and it will be unable to sell its goods in interstate commerce. This certainly is a landmark in legislative history. Undoubtedly the constitutionality is aided by the existence of the national emergency. Without such emergency such legislation would not be possible. It is my sincere hope, however, that once we have compelled the ruthless minority who prey upon labor to give labor a decent wage, that never again will these men be permitted to continue their sweatshops.

The seeming prosperity of the Coolidge administration was but a mirage that did not slake a thirst of toiling laborer. There was a terrific gap between the income received by the laborer and the income received by the broker and financier. This bill states the new American philosophy, "The new deal and the square deal." Labor and capital must share alike in the prosperity of the country.

A progressive administration will see to it that no corporation is allowed to become a monopoly; a progressive administration will see to it that sound industry be fostered. We have gone a long way from the small shop of colonial days. New conditions demand new rules. We cannot return to unbridled private enterprises even if we would. This bill recognizes the implications of the new day and goes a long step toward providing honest industry with a chance to gain a reasonable profit. This bill helps insure labor a living wage, a chance to work under decent conditions, and the opportunity to participate in the prosperity and heritage of America. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY].

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, although there are some features of this bill which do not meet with my approval, especially the reemployment and relief tax section which provides for the method of raising the revenue to support this great measure for relief, I am informed, and I believe that it is generally understood by the Members of the House, that a motion to recommit, for the purpose of reporting in an alternative plan for this revenue, will be offered under the rule, and Members will have an opportunity to vote on that plan. But who could undertake to draft into legislation so comprehensive a plan, designed at once to encourage national industrial recovery, foster fair competition, adjust the hours and working conditions of labor, and to create widespread employment without some imperfections? It is the main objective of this bill, the creation of employment, which calls forth my enthusiastic support.

The gentleman from New York on the Republican side who spoke against this measure yesterday stated that he voted with great pleasure to support the President on the economy bill but that he would not support the President on what he termed "this extravagant program." In short, he has expressed the utmost willingness to support legislation which has taken away earning power, and consequently buying power, from the Government worker and pensions from disabled soldiers, which has also represented buying power in every town and hamlet of our country, but refuses to support creative legislation which will produce buying power among the rank and file of Americans. He terms this the extravagance program of the President because the President of the United States, in a heroic and courageous effort, strikes at the roots of this economic evil and asks for the passage of this legislation which, in one bold stroke, would stimulate industry which has fallen into chaotic decay, would assist labor, which has lost its effective force because of the inoperation of the law of supply and demand, and which would make uniform minimum wage and maximum hours of employment conditions throughout our country, and, above all, would create opportunities for employment for tradesmen, craftsmen, and unskilled labor in a great diversity of occupations throughout this land.

Because of this effort to accomplish for industry that healthy condition which, of its own initiative, it has been unable to maintain because of lack of cooperation, overproduction, short-sighted policies, and exploitation of labor, the gentleman from New York characterizes this as an attempt to sovietize industry. He attempts to deprecate the effectiveness of this measure by claiming that it will not create employment for the 6,000,000 men claimed for it but that it will only provide employment for a million five hundred thousand men.

Even if we were to grant this latter assertion, does not the gentleman think that, even if this number of men could be given jobs so that they may earn an honest day's pay and once again maintain self-respect, provide for themselves and families, and be removed from the overburdened welfare lists of their cities and private charities, this result would justify the raising and expenditure of this money? Does the gentleman not feel that, by providing these men with earning power and consequently buying power, countless others would also be benefited? Does he not realize that these men must live and spend a good part of this money, and that in so doing other people are employed to supply them? These people, in turn, must also spend, thus creating employment for still more people—and so on; it would permeate throughout our entire economic structure. Or does the gentleman still hold to the Republican theory that the only method of restoring prosperity is to refinance the bankers and defunct corporations so that they may provide dividends to the holders of their overcapitalized and watered stock? His own party was in control in the throes of this depression, and no such heroic and courageous effort as the present one came from its leadership. Now that this great effort to create, as his Republican colleague from Pennsylvania stated, "a social invention which will match our mechanical invention" has been offered, he condemns it in such deprecating terms. Our great President, when he took his oath of office on the steps of this Capitol, promised the American people action. He started the next day and has never let up in his brave efforts in facing squarely the difficulties and recommending swift and direct action going directly to the seat of the cancerous growth which has steadily sapped the vitality of our national existence. This is the greatest measure of all that have come before the Congress. It is the measure for which the American people have been anxiously waiting.

The eloquent constitutional lawyer from Pennsylvania has deplored the assault upon the Constitution which, in his opinion, this measure makes. It was called to his attention that, in 1917, great and plenary powers were conferred by the Congress on the War Industries Board. His reply, in effect, was that, of course, in time of war great latitude must be given to those in charge of our national defense. But could the gentleman think of any more devastating invasion upon our national security and existence than has been brought about by the present emergency? Does the gentleman realize that our whole national life, industry, labor, agriculture, are being threatened with ruin? This is the greatest emergency we have ever faced. Extraordinary methods and measures will be required to fight this war. Courage and confidence are now needed as never before at any time in our history and, if necessary, rather than let the creeping paralysis which is threatening our national life make any further progress, we must transcend the strictly literal and technical interpretation of the Constitution in our struggle for survival. It has been my contention and my honest belief that prosperity will not return until we are able to place in the pockets of the ordinary American a week's wages, a large part of which he will spend and thus promote further employment.

On the theory that the benefits thereof would sift down through our economic system, we have poured great sums of money into the top of this system. It has drained off like water in sand and has left no appreciable beneficial traces. Now it is time for us to bolster up the foundations of our economic system by placing this assistance with the workers. This will aid other workers and will eventually permeate our whole economic structure. The previous policy has failed miserably to effect any measure of recovery. The proposed policy will result in lending assistance to those people who are most direly in need. The Republican Party has tried the one experiment and it has failed. Let us now try helping that man at the bottom of the economic ladder who has so often, in the last campaign, been referred to as the "Forgotten Man."

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, like most of the bills that have come before us at this extra session of the Congress no chance is given to amend this bill. We cannot dot an "i" or cross a "t." We must accept the bill as a whole, or else we must reject it as a whole. This is true notwithstanding the fact that there are three different and unrelated titles contained in it.

The first title is designed to promote cooperation among trade groups and for the elimination of unfair competition by the formulating of codes for the regulation of such industries. The second title provides for a huge construction employment program through the expenditure of about three and one third billions of dollars. The third title contains some miscellaneous provisions and seeks to amend the emergency relief and construction act.

Title 2 is a tax measure, and three distinct methods are combined in order to raise the revenues for the gigantic construction program contemplated by the bill. This title proposes to raise the normal income-tax rates; it proposes to increase the present excise tax on gasoline; and it proposes to subject corporate dividends to the payment of normal rates of income taxes.

If an opportunity were given to vote separately upon the different unrelated subjects dealt with, or if opportunity were given to vote separately upon the different specific tax provisions of the bill, there is scarcely a Member who would endorse all of these provisions as now written. This is especially true concerning the methods proposed for raising the revenues necessary to pay for the public works and the renewed employment of labor which the bill contemplates.

In the consideration of any tax measure we should give favorable thought to any suggestion that might relieve the grievous load of taxation carried by our people and that might transfer it even in small degree to foreign people, provided that the suggestion is just and equitable. And in this connection I call attention to the fact that the tolls charged for use of the Panama Canal should come in for a rightful share of the increased burden of taxation which the bill levies upon our industries. If the bill proves to be a success, then it will increase commerce and industry in huge proportions and the carriers of our freight, both on land and at sea, will reap a harvest of renewed and increased returns. The Panama Canal is undoubtedly the greatest work for the benefit of trade and commerce ever accomplished by mankind since the morning stars first sang together; and it will continue to bless generations of time until the trumpet shall sound an eternal end to earthly things. It was opened to traffic in 1914, and since then it has been used by the commerce of the world in great and increasing proportions, except that its early years were hampered by landslides and its traffic reduced by war conditions, and during the past few years the general economic distress has lessened its usefulness.

The report of the Governor of the Panama Canal for 1932 shows that at the close of the fiscal year the total capital investment was $533,106,009.47 and the net receipts for that year were about $11,751,896.32. Consequently, the net receipts represented a return of about 2 percent on the capital investment.

I submit that this is not an adequate return. It is not as large a return as the net interest at 3 percent which is charged against the operations of the Canal as a bookkeeping proposition in each fiscal year. Two percent falls far short of what we should expect the Canal to pay. Under the rate decisions of our courts railroads are sometimes allowed by the courts to receive as high as 6 percent. And if this bill will restore trade and commerce, then those who use the Canal will be benefited materially and they should expect to aid us in restoring the conditions which will have brought renewed and increased incomes to them.

The very essence of this bill is to restore trade and commerce and if this is done then the commerce which goes through the Canal should help to pay the bill, and increased tolls should be charged for transit through the Canal. Those who dance should be willing to pay the fiddler.

The Panama Canal Act of August 24, 1912, contains general provisions for the levying of tolls and authorizes the President to establish rules for measurement of vessels. There are limitations in the act. Confusion has arisen in practice concerning the formula which is to be used in ascertaining the net tonnage of the vessel. This is a technical matter. But the point is that the statutes with reference to these tolls should be amended and the President should be given power to increase these tolls so as to return an income commensurate with the services afforded by the Canal and pay from 4 percent to 6 percent upon the capital investment. This proposition is simply a good business proposition. We should require an adequate return for service rendered and capital invested.

Moreover, an increase of these tolls would result in increased payments by foreign shipping and shippers. In the fiscal year of 1932 tolls paid by foreign shippers were 53 percent of the total, those paid by United States ships in intercoastal trade were 33 percent, and those paid by United States ships in foreign trade were 14 percent.

In order to double the net return of approximately $11,000,000 paid last fiscal year, it would not be necessary to double the tolls, because the overhead and expense of its officers and management would not increase. Any increase of tolls above the present rates would go immediately to the net-profit account without being used for the necessities of the Canal and its management.

It is believed that a small percentage of increased tolls could be charged and thereby double the amount of the net returns of the Canal. If we increased its net receipts by $10,000,000, then it is plain that $5,300,000 of the increase would be paid by foreign shipping; that $3,300,000 would be paid by United States ships not in competition with foreign shipping; and that only $1,400,000 would be paid by United States ships which compete with foreign bottoms.

And an increase of $10,000,000 per year would be equitable because the bill will restore many times that amount to the shippers who will enjoy the use of this great engineering work. This item should be included within the bill, and any future investigation which the Ways and Means Committee may make for taxation purposes should include a careful examination of this subject.

I submit this for your future consideration, knowing that it cannot be incorporated within the terms of the present bill because of the special rule which the majority here adopted; which will keep off all amendments and all modifications, although they may be good ones.

The bill has much that is objectionable; nevertheless there are fifteen to sixteen millions of men out of employment, and these men must have bread. This bill is the only means which the administration has offered them to regain a job and a livelihood and a chance to feed their wives and children. Therefore we will pass it in the belief that it is a humanitarian measure and one that is forced upon us by necessity. The cry of our people for bread must be answered.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, as is generally known, I am keenly interested in having a sales tax substituted for the tax provisions of the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee and which we are not considering.

By the imposition of a moderate sales tax I believe we can eliminate the proposed increase in tax on incomes of individuals, the normal tax on corporation dividends, the three fourths of a cent gasoline tax; and, in addition, we could eliminate the following excise taxes of the Revenue Act of 1932 (all of which taxes are extended by this bill): Tires and tubes, amounting to $15,000,000; automobile trucks, $20,000,000; radios, $3,000,000; tax on banks checks, $40,000,000.

In my opinion, a manufacturers' sales tax of 2¾ percent will be sufficient to accomplish that result and raise the revenue called for in this bill.

It is absolutely unfair, as provided in this bill, that persons who are working for a living should be assessed a 50-percent increase in income taxes when those with incomes of $1,000,000 would pay an increase of only 3½ percent. If our Democratic brethren wanted to put an additional tax on all individuals, why not make it a straight 10-percent increase, which would have treated all taxpayers alike and bring in $60,000,000 instead of $43,000,000, as estimated receipts in the pending bill?

We are now taxing the dividends of corporations very substantially at the source under the normal tax, and they are also subject to the surtax. We talk about "spurting" up industry and increasing business under the first sections of the bill, and at the same time we seem to be determined to do everything we can to retard business instead of promoting it by the imposition of new taxes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if we put a straight 10-percent increase in the normal tax all along the line it would bring in more money and at the same time treat everybody exactly alike?

Mr. BACHARACH. That is absolutely true, because the receipts from income taxes for the fiscal year is estimated at $600,000,000, and a 10-percent increase would amount to $60,000,000, whereas under the increase in income taxes in the plan carried in this bill it is estimated to bring in only $43.000,000.

Mr. SNELL. And the increase would apply to all the people alike?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes. Why do we talk for the sales tax? Canada has had a sales tax for over 10 years, and the present law carries a rate of 6 percent. It is working exceptionally well, is easy to administer, and the receipts are very satisfactory. They have had a sales tax since 1920, and they have varied the rates from time to time as business conditions demand.

Under the proposed plan we would eliminate all taxes on clothing and medicines and on a number of other commodities. In Canada they have a long list of exemptions, but, on the other hand, they tax some things that I would not favor taxing. A year or two ago we had before our committee representatives of the Canadian Government, who testified as to the merits of their sales tax, and we sent our own experts to Canada to investigate their sales tax, and they reported that the Canadian tax was working exceptionally well. I know that the Members of the House who have gone to Canada and made a study of their sales tax have returned with the thought that Canada had a very fine system of taxation.

This is not a new fad with me or with many Members of the House who favor a sales tax. We all realize that we must raise by taxation the money necessary to run the Government, and in my opinion after trying many other schemes, the only fair and equitable way to do it is to adopt a sales tax.

Take the situation just disclosed by the investigation now being conducted by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee: There could not have been any such evasion of taxes under a sales tax, because after all it is the man with the most money that spends the most, and for that reason the Government would receive more money.

In addition to that, a sales tax is one of the easiest taxes to collect. In Canada, although it is a small country, the receipts vary from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000, and it never costs them more than 5 percent for the collection of the tax.

Now, I intend to support a motion which will be offered to recommit the bill to eliminate the taxes I referred to at the beginning of my remarks and substitute therefor a manufacturers' sales tax of 2¾ percent. I think we should find that after we once get such a law into effect—and remember that this sales tax is nothing new in this country—we have 48 States that now have a sales tax of one form or another—every State has a gasoline tax, and 15 States have other taxes in addition——

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in this bill we carry a provision that after certain events occur—like the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and when the receipts of the Treasury are more than the expenditures, and we can afford to do it—this tax will pass out of the picture. Certainly we will know more about the repeal of the eighteenth amendment in 3 or 6 months.

Mr. BACHARACH. Then, I want to ask the gentleman, why did the committee propose a tax that cannot continue for more than a year?

Mr. RAGON. What tax is that?

Mr. BACHARACH. The general tax that you have put on—the excise tax.

Mr. RAGON. The excise tax was put on to broaden the base so as to give more confidence in the bonds. The gentleman knows that it takes some time to erect the machinery to collect.

Mr. BACHARACH. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that. The sales tax, if it went into effect the 1st of July, by the 1st day of August we would begin to get the revenue. Under the present set-up in the bill, you will not get a dollar of new revenue until the end of March 1934. Now I want to call attention to the revenue to be derived from a 2¾-percent sales tax such as I have suggested. It is estimated that it would bring in about $313,000,000, based on present business conditions.

As a matter of fact, business conditions are improving so it is reasonable to expect that the revenue would be considerably more than that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is it not a fact that in the last fiscal year, if we had had a manufacturers' excise tax of 2½ percent, excluding medicine and clothing and food, it would be sufficient, with the amendment proposed by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. BACHARACH. I think it would be.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. HAINES. I am rather confused. The gentleman said a moment ago that he would exempt clothing and medicine.

Mr. BACHARACH. And food.

Mr. HAINES. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] includes food.

Mr. BACHARACH. That is correct. It was my intention to include that also.

Mr. HAINES. It was mentioned this morning by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] that it would take 2 years before a sales tax could be put into operation.

Mr. BACHARACH. I will say this much for Mr. FREAR. He and I have been on the Ways and Means Committee for a great many years. He has always been opposed to a sales tax and still is. I am friendly to a sales tax and have been ever since I have been in Congress.

Mr. HAINES. I voted against the sales tax last year, but I am rather changing my mind about it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is a member of the Ways and Means Committee. What argument was used in the committee for extending this special discriminatory sales-tax provision of the bill in preference to a general equally distributed sales tax?

Mr. BACHARACH. The gentleman is speaking now about the extension?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. I would say that they slipped that over on the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. RAGON. Oh, I went to the gentleman personally myself and told him.

Mr. BACHARACH. After it was passed; yes.

Mr. RAGON. Oh no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I told him before.

Mr. BACHARACH. Even so, no one else knew it.

Mr. RAGON. And the gentleman said it was all right.

Mr. SNELL. What were the arguments used that they should have these special sales taxes instead of a general sales tax?

Mr. BACHARACH. Of course, there is every reason in the world for that. The reason is that there is an election coming along next year, and for that reason the Democrats are putting it in this year. They are afraid to face the issue a year from now.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will any opportunity be given to the House to vote on a motion to recommit, including a manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes. That will be done this afternoon. There will be a motion made to recommit.

In conclusion, I reiterate that the tax burden proposed by the bill is improperly distributed upon certain classes and certain industries, and that a fairer apportionment of such burden could have been secured by other proposals made to but rejected by the committee. [Applause.]

I have no criticism of the general features of the national industrial recovery bill. In the present emergency I cheerfully subscribe to measures which give reasonable assurance of providing for employment and for the revival of business. It must be realized, however, that the success of these general provisions of the bill depends more on their judicious administration than on the mere wording of the legislation. The President is faced with a tremendous task in executing the plans outlined in the bill.

To the taxing provisions of the bill, as contained in section 208, I cannot give approval.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Georgia [Mr. Cox], at the outset of his remarks, said that he was fearful of the loss of many of his good friends in the House because of the position that he has taken against the passage of this bill. The gentleman need have no fear in this respect.

The position he takes evidences courage on his part, an adherence to his convictions, and a willingness to express his convictions, even when it is apparent that the great majority of the Members of the House differ from him. Instead of losing, my distinguished friend retains the many friendships that he has always possessed and strengthens the admiration that we entertain toward him, not only for his ability but for his courage. Courage is a necessary element of leadership. My friend possesses that element. Mr. Cox made another significant statement, that this is a very serious hour because of the magnitude of the problems that confront us. It is because of the fact that this is a very serious hour, by reason of the magnitude of the problems that confront us, that many who never expected a year or two or three or four or five years ago to ever vote for this kind of legislation are willing to vote for the passage of this bill at this time in the hope that it will tend to solve some of the problems that confront us today.

Last February the people of America were in a very disheartened state of mind. Lack of unity existed everywhere. There was no unity between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government; there was no unity in business, nor among the people generally; there was lack of confidence and a strong feeling of fear prevalent throughout the entire country. Since March 4—and I say this impersonally, not desiring to express myself at this time directly or indirectly in criticism of the last administration—the entire situation has changed. Unity exists between the executive and legislative branches of the Government; unity is beginning to assert itself in business, confidence has reasserted itself, and as confidence reasserts itself, fear begins to vanish from the minds of the people.

All of this has been because of the leadership of President Roosevelt. All of us cannot agree with everything that President Roosevelt recommends, but one thing is certain, and that is his program in the main has been the influence which has brought about the change in the minds of the American people which has occurred between March 4 and the present date. He presents to us this bill and asks the Congress of the United States to pass it in order that he might further carry out the program that he has in mind for the rehabilitation of industry and for the relief of the unemployed and of the distressed in the United States. The industry-control feature of the bill is probably the most important part of the program which he has in mind for the rehabilitation of industry and of our people. After listening to the evidence before the Committee on Ways and Means, I am satisfied to support this bill.

I do not consider it a delegation of legislative power, but as a statement of broad legislative policy, with the delegation of broad powers of discretion in administration to the President and to the executive branch of government. I am of the opinion that in the future the Congress of the United States, in view of the crowded conditions that confront us, in view of the rapid changes economically and socially that have taken and will continue to take place, in view of the force of economic law itself, we will be compelled to delegate more and more to the administrative unit broad discretionary powers of administration, with Congress outlining in a broad, general way the legislative policy which we think would be for the best interests of the American people.

This bill does not set up a dictatorship, and I make that statement with all due respect to any of my distinguished friends who have opinions to the contrary. This constitutes a broad delegation of administrative power, necessary to meet the emergency that confronts us. This is legislation to meet an emergency, not legislation that we are considering and passing during a normal period, but legislation to meet an emergency situation; and such legislation, in my opinion, should be flexible and elastic so that those through whose hands it is administered will have the discretionary administrative power to meet changes as they may occur. I subscribe to such legislation at this time. I think that in our own minds each and every one of us realizes that in these days it is for our best interests for Congress to establish the broad legislative policy and not to undertake to regulate every action on the part of the person or persons through whom the law will be administered. This particular bill states, in broad terms, the legislative policy and gives to the administrative unit, to the President of the United States, the only man in the United States whose constituency is the entire country, broad powers of administration. I subscribe to it in these days. In normal times I subscribe to broad delegation of administrative powers, as necessary from a practical angle, to meet the rapid changes that economic law has in the past and will in the future rapidly bring about.

Of course, I recognize there are two sides to the public works bill. I recognize that some feel that $3,300,000,000 is too high. I recognize that some men may feel honestly that it is deflationary. I do not say that I disagree with them in their opinion if they entertain it, but we have to give employment, we have to do something, as far as we can, in order that government itself, through direct activity, may relieve the unemployment situation in conjunction with those benefits that will flow from the passage of the first and primary feature of the bill—the control of industry. The exercise of the agency of government when necessary, as now, to control industry, or to enable industry to control itself for the general welfare, while unfortunate, is a proper exercise of its secondary functions. There is nothing radical about it. It is unfortunate that we have to resort to this kind of legislation; but in this crisis, with large groups of our people socially and economically affected, with no private agency remaining to cope with the situation, to control and regulate the situation for the common good and for the general welfare, there is one agency left, and that agency we are justified in resorting to; that agency is the Government of the United States.

This bill is consistent with the present predominating political thought. It is true that it is a step that practically all of us would not like to see ourselves compelled to take at this or any time, but the emergency calls for action. Private enterprise, private agencies have collapsed. They are unable to cope with the situation, and we must turn to government, and we provide for the use of the power and influence of government to enable business, for a period of 2 years at least, as provided in this bill, to regulate itself, if possible, for the common good and for the general welfare. If business refuses to do it, then we give to the President the power to compel industry to do what ought to be done.

I do not want to discuss the constitutional question because I realize there is a serious question involved. However, my mind meets with that of my friend from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], that in this emergency the Supreme Court will recognize that the legislation is aimed at, and for this period aimed at the common good in a great crisis, and that they will construe this act from that angle, recognizing its necessity, its expediency, and its response to existing public opinion.

In the inability of private agencies to cope with a situation that threatens the general welfare there is only one agency that remains, and that is government. Under such conditions, in an emergency, we are justified, in fact, it is our duty, to resort to the use of such agency, if by the use and exercise of the powers of government we can bring favorable results for the common good. There are times when government must undertake some particular activity to assist affected groups, which, while not obligatory, is expedient or necessary for the general welfare.

The pending bill constitutes an unusual and extraordinary use of the powers of government, justified only by the conditions that exist; unfortunate, but necessary and expedient. This legislation must be viewed in the light of existing conditions. Viewing it as I do, with great regret that exsting conditions compel me to do so, I consider it my duty to vote for such legislation with the hope that conditions will so improve in the near future that its continuance will not be necessary. It is not a question of our personal feeling with reference to such legislation. The primary question is, What is necessary for the general welfare of all the people? The general welfare is paramount to individual opinions, desires, or ambitions of any citizen or group of citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I want to speak briefly on the tax features of this bill. The President said that the tax features in this bill, taxes to raise the amount necessary to pay the interest and amortization charges, must be definite and certain. We all agree with that view. Taxes must be definite and certain. They must be definite and certain to assure the sale of the bonds.

The Committee on Ways and Means has reported an increase in the normal rates for incomes from 4 to 6 percent and 8 to 10 percent. The committee has recommended the normal income-tax rate being applied to dividends. There has also been recommended an increase of three quarters of 1 cent on each gallon of gasoline. These taxes are deflationary. Such taxes tend to limit the benefits which will flow from the public-works feature of the bill. The taxes reported are imposed upon people who are already overburdened. They are placed upon groups and classes of our citizens who cannot afford to stand any additional taxes at this time. Of course, they will, if these tax features are passed, but the effects will be very deflationary.

The purpose of the public-works feature of the bill is to expand. It has an inflationary objective—to expand construction and to relieve unemployment—and yet there are attached to the bill taxes which are deflationary and which will interfere with the maximum benefits that will be obtained from this feature of the bill if the taxes were not so deflationary.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Is this, in the gentleman's opinion, the best bill the Ways and Means Committee could report in order to give jobs to the unemployed?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course we all have our individual opinions. I suppose I could sit down and write a bill that I would consider a better one. There are some provisions that could be improved upon, but we have to compromise at times. We have to give and take in legislating. Furthermore, let me say that the executive and legislative branches of government are responding to public opinion today.

The legislative branch of government is not supreme today. The executive branch of government is supreme in response to public opinion; and I subscribe to that public opinion in this emergency. I am willing to subscribe to a public opinion that will make the executive branch of government in these times predominant and the most influential so far as the public mind is concerned. The executive branch of the Government sent this bill up here. The President thinks it will accomplish the maximum amount of good. I may have different opinions in some respects, but I am satisfied to accept this representing our composite views, as the best that can be passed by this Congress.

To come back to taxation, three quarters of 1 cent a gallon is added to the tax on gasoline. Gasoline is already overtaxed. How are you going to answer to your automobile owner and others in your district affected by this tax? What about your middle classes, whose income taxes have been seriously increased and who will be affected also by the tax on dividends and by the gasoline tax? The middle class is the substantial class of the citizenry of any country. The middle class is the bulwark of sound and substantial government. Our middle class in the main represents the average persons who have climbed up the ladder of economic and social life, and as members of the middle class earn $4,000, $5,000, $6,000, $8,000, or $10,000 a year and pay their taxes. This is the class that takes care of relatives and friends who are less fortunate economically. This class has the greatest burden of any of the classes that pay taxes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am going to support the motion to recommit for a limited manufacturers' excise tax [applause] food, clothing, and medicine exempt, with a repeal of the tax on bank checks and a repeal of the special excise tax against automobiles, letting them come under the 2½ or 2¾ limited manufacturers' excise tax that will be the subject of the motion to recommit.

If I can be recognized by the Speaker, I intend to make the motion to recommit for a 2½-percent manufacturers' excise tax, food, clothing, and medicine exempt; repeal the tax on bank checks; repeal the excise tax on automobiles and accessories, to be placed in the category paying the 2½ percent in the motion to recommit.

Such a tax is the broadest possible and, therefore, the fairest in this emergency. The average person will be taxed considerably less under this method than by the taxes recommended by a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means. The taxes in the pending bill must be paid, in the main, by the middle class of citizens and by the worker. The person with an income in excess of $10,000 a year bears very little of these taxes. With food, clothing, and medicine exempt, the average person will have a slight burden imposed upon him in comparison with the burden imposed by the tax provisions of the pending bill. Furthermore, the imposition of the manufacturers' excise tax will create a feeling of confidence which will assure greater success in the sale of bonds necessary for the carrying out of the public-works program of this bill. A highly deflationary tax will be harmful to the success of the public-works program. While all taxes are deflationary, nevertheless, when necessary to impose them, particularly in an emergency, the least deflationary and depressing method should be resorted to. We are confronted with a condition and not a theory and, if necessary to cope with the situation, principle should be temporarily suspended.

I hope the Members will consider this and realize that the manufacturers' excise tax is the most equitable to impose at this time; the least deflationary in its character of any proposed. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for this legislation.

I am not in accord with several of its provisions, and the gentleman who has just left the floor, the gentleman from Massachusetts, has very well expressed my views regarding some of the features of this bill, particularly the taxing features of it; and when his motion to recommit the bill is made, I shall vote for it. I favor a manufacturers' sales tax in lieu of the increase in normal income taxes. I am also against a further tax on gasoline.

I am going to vote for this bill, Mr. Chairman, entirely on the ground of the emergency with which we are confronted. I dare say that 3 years ago this legislation would not have received a dozen votes in this body, but today we are confronted with a condition that requires us to make many concessions in an effort to meet them. One provision of the bill I am heartily in accord with, and that is that it expires in 2 years.

I have a telegram here that I received yesterday from the chairman of the relief committee of the county where I live. This is typical of conditions that prevail generally throughout the country but probably somewhat accentuated in southern California by reason of certain climatic conditions that attract people to that section of the country at certain seasons of the year. The chairman of the relief committee wired me yesterday that in Los Angeles County there are 110,000 families being fed daily, with an average of 3.9 persons to the family, making a total of approximately 430,000 people being helped daily by charity. This condition has placed on the people of this section a tremendous hardship which they cannot bear indefinitely.

The people of that county during the past 10 months, according to this telegram, have spent $20,000,000 of their own funds, and they have pending in that State at this time an election to be held on June 27 calling for a bond issue of another $20,000,000 with which to meet this emergency.

These are the conditions which prompt me, if you please, to support this measure. I dislike to confer on any board or commission such arbitrary powers as are conferred here, but I can afford to yield much when the relief of human suffering is at stake.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, I am voting for this measure with no illusionment that it is going to solve the problem entirely. It may, and I think it will, do a great deal toward helping the situation. A year ago, if you remember, Congress authorized through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to the total extent of $3,800,000,000. Up to this time the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has advanced money in different forms to industry in the sum of $2,600,000,000, and this money has already gone into circulation to a large extent for the purpose of relieving unemployment; yet it has hardly made a dent in it. A year ago it was said we had 11,000,000 people out of employment. Today it is said we have anywhere from 13,000,000 to 14,000,000 out of employment. We do not know what the extent of unemployment would have been had it not been for the steps we have taken; but no Member of this House should vote for this bill believing it is going to entirely solve the problem, because, after all, while this legislation calls for $3,300,000,000 in advancements, it actually provides only $2,100,000,000 more than is already available. Provision is made in the bill for the discontinuance of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and any margin left in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the way of loaning power is transferred to this new organization. The loan powers left in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation amounts to $1,200,000,000, and this is merged into the $3,300,000,000 provided for in this bill.

So, as a matter of fact, we are only making available an additional sum of $2,100,000,000 instead of the $3,300,000,000. I shall vote for the bill, and hope it will be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WADSWORTH.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, obviously, it is impossible, in a period of 7 minutes, to even attempt to discuss the provisions of this extraordinarily important measure, a measure which contains three separate and distinct proposals, as I see them.

In approaching a discussion of it, brief as this discussion of mine must be, I cannot help giving some consideration to what might be termed the power of hysteria. Most of us have lived through at least one period of political hysteria. By this I mean hysteria and excitement which inevitably accompany a state of war and which, certainly, characterized the atmosphere in America during the World War. There have been other periods prior to that time of a similar character. In reading the history of my country I note that immediately following the Civil War such a spirit seized upon great multitudes of people. This had its effect in the so-called "reconstruction period", a most distressing and disastrous effect, and one which we now greatly regret.

Out of the hysteria and the excitement of the World War came the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. I think no one will contend that had it not been for that excitement the eighteenth amendment would not have been submitted by the Congress nor ratified by such a number of States. It has taken 14 years, practically, for us to retrace our steps toward a correction of the ghastly error committed in 1918 by the ratification of that Amendment. [Applause.] It has been a long battle, waged around a fundamental question of government, and for one I rejoice that that battle is about to be won. I think I am not wrong in saying that today we are in a period of excitement and hysteria. It is easy to understand why this is so, and I am leveling no criticism at the American people or their representatives in any capacity.

I have been wondering, as I endeavor to be philosophical about these things, what would emerge from this period which would involve, eventually, and perhaps sooner than most of us expect, another great battle on a fundamental question. I am now led to believe that title I of this bill will seize the attention of those who have some regard for the fundamental principles of our Government and Constitution and that around it and whatever may follow it in the way of future legislation will wage one of the greatest battles politically that the country has ever known. I may be wrong about this. It is dangerous to prophesy. Time alone can tell, but I think I am right. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] spoke his convictions upon it yesterday and demonstrated to you the extraordinary importance of it from a constitutional standpoint. I shall not attempt to discuss it from a constitutional standpoint. I am not a lawyer, and, as my good friend, George Moses, of New Hampshire, once said, I have not even been admitted to the bar. [Laughter.] But it strikes me that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] struck the keynote of this whole situation when he said yesterday in relation to this measure, "We ought to understand that what we have always held as individualism in America has come to an end."

I think his analysis of the purpose of this measure is correct. Individualism in America will come to an end if legislation of this type and character is placed upon our statute books and kept there. I know it is contended that this legislation is meant to be kept in force but for 2 years, but, Mr. Chairman, many of its supporters and some of its authors have every hope and conviction that it will become the permanent policy of America. Certainly the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] believes so. Certainly my good friend, Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, believes so. He is one of the principal authors of this bill and made the statement in a hearing before the Senate committee that when the 2-year period expired undoubtedly the legislation would be continued in effect; if not in this exact form, in some form very similar to it.

So I think we cannot console ourselves in the belief that this is simply temporary. For this represents a school of thought becoming more influential in America, a school of thought which has gained force and adherence as a result of this depression but whose adherents are looking far beyond the termination of this depression and are intent upon transforming the whole picture—industrial, political, and social—of American life.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The end of individualism in America! I cannot help but believe that this means the end of real liberty and the substitution of bureaucracy—the hard, heavy, cold hand of bureaucracy—upon the daily lives of millions and millions of Americans.

If this shall be the policy adopted here, and continued hereafter, then, indeed, I am sorry for my sons and their sons, for they and their contemporaries will have to live in a country whose people shall be regimented, controlled, guided, and, finally, compelled to adopt whatever methods of life government imposes upon them.

You may think that I am exaggerating the possibilities of this situation. I think I am not, if I understand the tendency of this legislation and the intent of those who are its principal authors and defenders. This is but the beginning. It is the beginning of one of the greatest political battles in our history, a battle to be waged around a fundamental question of government. Should this legislation go to the statute books and 2 years hence be repeated, as certainly a determined effort will be made to have it repeated, then this battle will start. And it may take up another 14 years to correct another ghastly error in government emanating from a period of hysteria. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I listened with a great deal of interest to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said, and if we were in anything like normal condition in this country and in the world I should feel disposed to share his opinion. But I am not willing at this time to wrap the conditions of this country in the cold legalism of an inflexible Constitution, made at a time back when our forbears wore silver buckles on their slippers, long stockings, knee breeches, and powdered wigs. [Laughter.]

We are in a condition worse than any we were ever placed in before in this country. The gentleman from New York speaks about the reaction following different wars that we have had. I would call his attention to the fact that is well known by every man who walks up and down the streets of our cities and highways of our rural communities, that never has such an economic condition ever confronted this country in all its history.

We granted in war time powers to the President greater than we are giving by this bill. Men lifted up their voices in the well here against that delegation of authority as we have in this bill. They saw the same catastrophe in the future.

But when the occasion for these extraordinary powers had passed we lapsed back into normal exercise of the powers under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, I think the Constitution of the United States is one of the greatest documents that was ever penned by man. I have always viewed the greatness and the very genius of the Constitution to be found in the fact that it was a flexible Constitution. I never viewed it as an inflexible document. I have always thought that my Constitution could reach down and take us out of the condition we are in now, and do it immediately.

Certainly the fathers of the Constitution, living in that time when we were 30 days from Europe, when a steamboat whistle might have frightened Thomas Jefferson and George Washington nigh unto death, certainly they looked into the future and drafted a Constitution that might meet the necessity of today.

Now, I am used to hearing the oratorical efforts of my friend from Pennsylvania, but let me say that he was well answered by another gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] and I am indebted to him for many pleasant hours that he has spoken on the Constitution. I am used to hearing the legalistic paroxism of my friend from Georgia, who uses them against practically every bill that comes up. But I refuse to dress my Constitution of the United States with the silver buckles, the long stockings, and powdered wigs of 150 years ago. [Applause.] If they had been here when the antitrust law was passed in the nineties, they would have howled that Congress could not pass such an act because it was unconstitutional. Now they come in here for the sake of industry, for the sake of labor, for the sake of agriculture, and ask, not for the repeal of the antitrust law but for the suspension of a law that has proved to be for the disadvantage of the economic conditions of this country. They receive from some Members the cold consolation that someone believes it is unconstitutional. This bill sets up the standards by which the President shall act. For the purposes of this bill he becomes the agent of Congress. He simply pursues a course we direct and follows a path which we blaze out.

That is all there is to it. They can holler unconstitutionality all they want to, but when they end up they will be just like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] who practically admitted yesterday that the Supreme Court would hold the bill constitutional.

The idea of this bill is to stop the fellows who are exploiting the sweat and blood of American labor. We had an illustration in one of our States of a certain manufacturing concern. There were gentlemen on the committee from that State. The proposition was brought up by a great manufacturing concern coining advantage out of the desperate condition of their laborers.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Not now. The concern said to these people, "If you come in here and work for 50 cents or a dollar a day, then we will open our mills and give you an opportunity of employment." What is to be the reply of the great breadline that is living off the cold and merciless charity of the world? They went in of course, and what was the result? Those industrial racketeers went into the markets of this country and practically put out of business every industry of a similar nature. Do you want to continue that? Is that square shooting? No. It is the purpose of this bill to stop such things as that.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Not now. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said a while ago that this was the building up of a plan. Knowing some of the gentlemen who are back of this, and knowing their antipathy to bureaucratic government, I say that is the furtherest-flung piece of argument I have ever listened to. The bill provides specifically for a 2-year tenure of this industrial act. I have not the time to go farther as I should like to into a legal argument on this, but I shall pass on so that I may give the House some information upon the tax question.

As suggested by several speakers here, when we got down to the financing of this public-works' program a number of different ways were suggested by which it might be done. If you are going to set up a bond issue of this amount, the all-important thing in the issuance of the bond is the setting up of a certain, definite revenue base for the retirement of those bonds. If you do not do that, what will happen? You will have difficulty in the first place in negotiating the sale of those bonds, and whenever you have that, you will have to sell them at a reduced price, and when you sell them at a reduced price you have a reflected influence on other Government bonds. Then you have a further influence upon your Federal Treasury. So, unless you get a definite and certain revenue base for this bond issue, I would not vote for the bill, because it would be too dangerous if you did not do that. Several suggestions were made. One suggestion was to issue paper money to pay this. We have already empowered the President with a tremendous power for expansion, and I see there has been inaugurated a controlled expansion of currency that is having, as I said, a good effect, but to turn loose on this country $3,300,000,000 of uncontrolled currency is too dangerous. It is entirely too dangerour to our Treasury and to the welfare of our people to think about it. My friends on the Republican side, and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], suggested a sales tax. I think just here it should be said that the minority members of this committee, the Republicans, worked shoulder to shoulder with us in the preparation of this bill, every word of it, and the only variance we had was upon the sales-tax question. What about a sales tax? I am willing to go down the line for a sales tax if you cannot do it in any other way. Listen to this significant statement. Mr. William E. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, whose opposition to the sales tax is well known by every American, said:

> Gentlemen, I say to you as members of this committee, that this bill is so important to the economic welfare of this country that I would agree to any kind of a tax, including a sales tax, but give the people of this country this bill.

That was echoed by Mr. Harriman, the president of the chamber of commerce, the voice of industry in this country. That statement was practically made also by Chester Gray, the representative of the American Farm Bureau, and, with the exception of the sales tax, was practically made by a representative of the American Grange.

What about the sales tax? The testimony we have before us and the testimony we had a year ago was that it would take a rather cumbersome piece of machinery to put it effectively to work. In order to keep the sales tax from being pyramided, you have to go into a system of licensing; and you cannot put this in operation in any 30 or 60 days. That is my contention. Then, again, it is well to remember that about 24 States of the Union have passed legislation enacting a sales tax. New York, for instance, has recently put on a 2-percent sales tax. I think Mississippi has a 2-percent sales tax.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Three percent.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And North Carolina has one of 3 percent.

Mr. RAGON. And that is a direct retail sales tax that you pay for when you buy your piece of cheese in a grocery store. There is no doubt about the fact that a manufacturers' sales tax for the first 4 or 5 months will necessarily and naturally be pyramided.

All right. If you put 2½-percent sales tax on now, including the possibility and probability of pyramiding it, what will you have in North Carolina? You will be putting on those people, in practical effect, a 6-percent sales tax. I do not think you should do it. I think you should take into consideration also this fact, and I am saying this as a man who has always supported the eighteenth amendment. I voted for its submission, but I am saying to you frankly I do not think it will be 12 months before that amendment will be repealed. I am giving it 18 months at the outside. I have been in politics long enough, I think, to understand the public sentiment and public thought, and I think the eighteenth amendment is doomed, and I think it is doomed inside of 18 months.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 5 minutes which has been allotted to me.

Mr. RAGON. I thank the gentleman very much.

Now, gentlemen, the moment the eighteenth amendment is voted out of the Constitution there will rise up all of the old revenue laws that touched the liquor traffic, and when that is done it will bring in anywhere from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000, in addition to the present tax on beer as we have it. So why go to the trouble of setting up this cumbersome machinery for the collection of a sales tax, which you may not need in 12 months, and with the possibility of continual pyramiding on the part of anyone who touches it? I say to you it is not good business, nor is it good business sense.

The committee considered all those things, and in light of the facts before it, we decided the best thing was the taxes we put in.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I am always pleased to listen to the gentleman, but I was wondering why the Ways and Means Committee has used 3½ hours and the Chairman of the Committee on Labor cannot get one minute to explain what happened to the 30-hour week? [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. I thought the gentleman would get his time on the other side.

Mr. CONNERY. I cannot get it on either side.

Mr. RAGON. That is the side the gentleman should get it from.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman not think this bill would go far to wipe out the sweatshops in the United States?

Mr. RAGON. There is no question in the world about it.

Mr. DUNN. If it does nothing else but that, it is a damned good bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAGON. Now, the normal tax in this bill on the first $4,000 is increased from 4 percent to 6 percent. From $4,000 to the top it is increased from 8 percent to 10 percent. Some have said we only increased it 20 percent—all the upper bracket. I think if you will figure it out you will find it is 25 percent.

Then we put a tax on gasoline. That is irksome to us all, I know, but it is a tax that is absolutely certain.

Now, let me tell you this much more. The tax on gasoline, under this bill, gets more favor than any other industry that the bill touches for this reason: I am acquainted very well with the oil industry in this country. Every man here from an oil State knows the dilapidated and wrecked condition of the oil industry. They are looking forward to this bill to give the President power to bring the recalcitrant oil firms in under one of these agreements, a mandatory agreement, in order that they can limit production, as many of the States want to do, but find they cannot do, as well as to even up the industry and make every man share alike its burdens and everyone enjoy its advantages. That is one good thing for the oil industry.

The next thing is there are $400,000,000 carried in this bill for the purpose of construction of highways in this country. That, my friends, goes more to the advantage of gasoline than any other feature of the bill.

Now, this bill comes from the White House. Let us say that frankly. This bill is the composite of four men who sat around the table together and took the propositions submitted from labor, from agriculture, and from industry, and molded them all into this one bill. It is not the product of the minds of four men. I dare say it is the product of the minds of 400 men, and it is brought down here to us as a bill that we think will do more toward the rehabilitation of industry than any legislation yet proposed. Listen, my friends. We have been hollering here what we were going to do for these 12,000,000 idle people in the United States. The time has come to either fish or cut bait. You may not like the bill that is brought in here by this committee. My friend from Pennsylvania seems to have a distaste for General Johnson as administrator, and he is the only man I have ever heard who ever reflected on the ability of General Johnson, who is one of the strongest characters I ever met. You may not like him and you may not like Lewis Douglas, but, my friends, back of this proposition I put to each of you, I would burn it into your conscience and your minds, if you do not do something in this bill, in the name of Him that paints the lily and guides the sunbeams, what are you going to do for the 12,000,000 hungry men and women, little children, if you please, holding up their hands in supplication to you? They say to the man in the White House, "Our faith looks up to thee." What are you going to do about it? Oh, we may not like this, we may not like that, but, gentlemen, there is one thing certain that around the interest of the common man in this country there is rotating the heart of a great and good man in the White House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the Ways and Means Committee of the House will be the loser by the ascendency to the judiciary of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], who has just spoken. [Applause.]

I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, of course, it is useless to attempt to cover a subject of this importance in the 3 minutes allotted. There were some phases of the bill I wished to discuss. I shall refrain from doing so and content myself with the statement that I should have liked the opportunity to have discussed the subject of taxation, and likewise should have liked the opportunity to have at least proposed some amendments to the taxation feature of the bill.

I dislike especially the increases in income tax on the moderate incomes and likewise the increased tax on gasoline. These taxes can only add new burdens to the people who can least afford to bear them.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, in the short time at my disposal I wish to discuss the taxation features of this bill, and more particularly the tax on gasoline.

The taxation of gasoline in this country by Federal, State, and municipal governments has gotten to be nothing less than a racket. It has gotten to the place where today if you base it upon the wholesale price of the product the average State tax plus the Federal tax amounts to a total rate of 240 percent, and based upon the average retail price it imposes a sales tax of 48 percent.

We are invading a field which has been preempted by the States to the extent that 37.9 percent of all the taxes raised in the States of this country—that is, State taxes—are taxes upon automobile transportation, and over half of these taxes are taxes upon gasoline. Thus almost one fifth of all State taxes are raised from gasoline.

I object to this tax particularly because it is another tax upon the already tax-burdened farmer. He has to bear the burden of this tax to a greater extent than any other industry. The farmers of this country use practically 25 percent of all the gasoline that is consumed, and I call the attention of those who represent agricultural sections that in some of the agricultural States the farm consumption of gasoline for motor vehicles and tractors is more than half the total consumption of gasoline in those States. The farmer does not use gasoline for joy riding. He uses it because tractors and motor transportation with him have become a necessity.

The gasoline tax is a tax the farmer is not in a position to pass on. It is a part of his production costs, and for several years now he has not been making the cost of production. In other words, he has been living off of capital instead of income.

Now let me conclude by calling to your attention the fact that there appeared before this committee when the tax features of this bill were under consideration representatives of several great agricultural organizations; and they were very emphatic on this occasion, as they have been in the past, in opposing this tax upon gasoline and in stating that it meant placing a new burden upon the American farmer at a time when he is least able to bear it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, it is proposed by the pending bill to issue bonds of $3,300,000,000. Of this amount, $400,000,000 is to be allocated for the construction of highways. Under the old method or former method of alloting this money among the several States, known as the "Federal Highway Act", one third was allotted on the basis of population, one third on the basis of area, and one third on the basis of public-road mileage. Under the present bill this is to be changed. It is not to be allocated in that manner; neither is it to be allocated on the basis of unemployment. The bill provides that three quarters of the money shall be allocated on the basis of the Federal Highway Act and one quarter on the basis of population. This means that one half of the $400,000,000 would be expended on the basis of population, one quarter on the basis of area, and one quarter on the basis of public-road mileage. In my own State this would mean a loss of approximately $800,000, and it is interesting to note that the Empire State of New York would receive under this plan $25,400,000 for its 12½ million people, while the State of Wyoming would receive $4,000,000 for its 225,000 people. There are 60 times as many people in the State of New York as there are in the State of Wyoming, but New York would receive only six times as much money as Wyoming.

Nearly 80 percent of all of the automobiles made in the United States are manufactured in or near the district which I represent in Michigan. It would cost each year $26,500,000 interest on the $400,000,000 allocated for the construction of roads, which everyone knows is an expenditure directly connected with the automobile industry.

That industry now has become the largest industry of the United States. This bill asks that industry not to pay just twenty-six and a half million dollars to cover the interest on the amount of money allocated to it by this bill, but it asks that the automobile industry shall yield $92,000,000 per year, or four times the amount of the carrying charges for the money given to that industry, and it is interesting to note that of the total amount of carrying charge or interest on this huge amount, amounting to $220,000,000, 42 percent is directly chargeable to the automotive industry of this country, which is an unfair and unjust discrimination against the greatest industry in the land today.

It is interesting to note that since the Federal Government has imposed a tax on motor vehicles, that $1,263,000,000 has been paid into the Federal Treasury, while the Government has returned or distributed to the several States as aid toward the construction of roads $1,190,000,000, or $73,000,000 less than it has received from this particular industry. This is proof positive that the automotive industry has paid its way and more. Therefore, I believe that the additional tax of three quarters of 1 percent on gasoline, and the continuation of the 1-cent tax for another year, is a severe blow to the industry and will tend to decrease its volume and sales and it will cause unemployment instead of putting more men to work. I may add that motor vehicles have paid 37⅝ percent of the total or gross revenue received by the States of the Union.

I say that the industry cannot stand this added burden and that it will do more harm than good.

If we really desire to balance the Budget without adding this enormous sum of $220,000,000 per year on the taxprayers of the country, I should like to have someone explain, who may be better informed on monetary matters than I am, why the Government could not issue sufficient money with which to pay the $7,000,000,000 of Liberty bonds and thereby save the people of the Nation $280,000,000 per year each year in interest.

It is my hope that a motion to recommit this bill might prevail in order that this injustice and discrimination to America's greatest industry may be corrected. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the able gentlemen who have discussed this measure. There is much in the bill, and in the motive behind it, which must command my support; but there are also provisions which do not have my approval. I find myself very much in agreement with my distinguished colleague, Mr. KNUTSON, who, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, proposed that the public-works program be financed without adding to the already too heavy bonded indebtedness of the Government.

Yesterday I voted against the adoption of the rule under which we are working, for I believed that an opportunity should be given the Members of this House to change the revenue provisions of the bill. I am sure that if an opportunity had been given to offer amendments, Members, irrespective of party, would have voted to change the provision which increases the burden of the small taxpayer 50 percent, and that of the man with an income of $1,000,000 a year only 3½ percent.

I hope that it may not be too late even now to make a change. Events have happened within the last few days, in the very shadow of this Capitol, which have altered the situation which confronted the Ways and Means Committee when it began consideration of this bill. Disclosures have been made of the methods by which men receiving great incomes evaded their taxes, not in part but in whole. It has been shown that the most powerful banking house in America, if not in the world, made no contribution whatever to the support of the Government in 1931 and 1932, and practically none in 1930. Advised by adroit lawyers, the masters of high finance found loopholes in the income-tax law through which they were able to make their escape. By offsets and deductions, by the devious device of setting up the right losses at the right time and in the right way, they were able to show that, technically they had no incomes.

I do not believe that the Ways and Means Committee, had it had the knowledge since disclosed, would have recommended that the public-works program be financed by increased taxes on the rank and file of the people—those of small incomes who are already overburdened. I do not believe that this committee, composed of just, honorable, and thoughtful men, would have voted to exact 7½ cents more from the workingman who puts 10 gallons of gasoline in his modest automobile when he leaves for a week-end trip into the country had it known that the great banking house of J. Pierpont Morgan pays not one dollar of tax upon its income.

When the committee framed this bill it was confronted by a Treasury statement showing that despite increased rates and lowered exemptions the income tax had returned nearly $300,000,000 less in 1933 than during the corresponding period in 1932; but it did not know some of the reasons for this shrinkage. It had not had opportunity to consider how income-tax receipts in the higher brackets could be greatly increased by repealing the provisions which allow deductions for capital losses.

The situation has changed, and therefore I believe that in fairness to the committee we should recommit this bill, with appropriate amendments, so that it may be reconsidered in the light of evidence which was unavailable when its taxing provisions were framed. If we fail to do this, we shall be unjust, not only to the members of the committee, but to ourselves; for we shall place ourselves in a position where we cannot vote for a measure highly essential for the economic rehabilitation of the country without also voting for the continuance of an inequitable tax system which robs the poor and exempts the rich.

If we undertake to finance unemployment relief by imposing increased taxes upon the people whose modest incomes now suffice only to meet their bare needs, we may fool ourselves, but we shall not fool our constituents. Of how much avail will it be, as a measure for creating employment, to take away from the family man with only $3,000 income, $10 a year in addition to the tax he already pays? The net result will be that he will have $10 less to spend for food, clothes, shoes, and other necessaries. There will be $10 less flowing into the channels of trade and commerce. There will be $10 less available for wages for men who produce food, clothes, shoes, in order that there may be $10 more available for wages for other men, who carry mortar and lay bricks. There will be no increase in the total of purchasing power, no increase in the volume of business. There will only be a shifting of activity, which will result in slow and continuing starvation of the businesses in which most people are normally engaged, and a sudden but brief gorging of the construction business, which furnishes employment to only a small group. Such a program, instead of restoring normality, would still further unbalance our lop-sided economy.

We are only robbing Peter to pay Paul, if we finance public works by levying additional taxes upon those who already put all they earn back into consumption.

This legislation will not accomplish its purpose unless we recruit for the battle against depression those dollars which do not now do their full duty, the slacker dollars hiding in the safe dug-out of unspent and unspendable accumulation, the dollars which do not buy goods and commodities, the dollars which do not hire men, the dollars which shirk taxes.

Personally I believe that we should finance the public-works program without issuing any more tax-exempt securities, without furnishing additional bombproof retreats for slacker dollars. We have voted to give the President power to issue currency. Let him issue $3,300,000,000 of it, and let us provide an annual retirement tax of $132,000,000 to redeem the currency in 25 years, and let that tax be paid, not by those who already pay too much, but by those who now pay nothing.

But if we are not yet ready to adopt the direct and sensible expedient of financing the public-works program and restoring to the money of the people its former value, at one time and in one operation, then I ask in the name of the overburdened people who have no smart lawyers to teach them how to evade their taxes, not to place the whole weight of reconstruction on those whose backs are already bent, but to make those who in the past have shirked their responsibility make up for their defaults, even to the extent of contributing out of their accumulations. There is no reason why those whom another Roosevelt would have called "malefactors of great wealth" should be allowed to escape with all their loot intact.

Do not spare those who by their unbounded greed and ruthless power have brought this curse upon the country.

Let those who have wrecked America help rebuild it!

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the bill now before the House for consideration, referred to as a bill to encourage national industrial recovery. I welcome the opportunity to vote for a measure that, if enacted into law, will bring relief to millions of the unemployed in this country, which, according to Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, now exceeds 13,000,000.

First, the bill provides for an appropriation of $3,300,000,000 for public works and construction projects; and, second, reduces the hours of labor through administrative agencies, as provided for in title 1 of the bill.

Two years ago, a sincere effort was made by a number of Members of the Senate and was supported by a group of Members of this House to secure an appropriation of several billion dollars to provide public work to stem the tide of the depression and, at this time, Mr. William Randolph Hearst proposed, as a remedial measure, a bond issue of $5,000,000,000. I heartily and promptly endorsed that method of relief because I recognized in it a sincere effort to relieve suffering and put men back to work, and so stated on this floor at that time.

Our country today is faced with a condition unparalleled in the 150 years of its history, and threatens the breaking down of our present economic system. In this, the wealthiest of all nations, there are more than 13,000,000 capable workers with millions more of their dependents who are suffering because of unemployment.

We are in the midst of the most violent and sudden economic changes our country has ever experienced. To adjust ourselves to these changes a new social policy must be adopted. Of all the principal measures advocated for this purpose, those that provide shorter hours of labor offer the most logical and direct steps without placing an additional burden on the Public Treasury.

Mass production made possible by the progress of mechanical invention and by the application of high-geared efficiency created a new era and changed this Nation from a static agricultural to a dynamic industrial country. This notable change is reflected in the fact that during the 10 years preceding the depression not 1 percent of all foreign immigration into the United States has settled upon the farms. The consequent growth in urban industrial centers has raised certain unforeseen and difficult problems. We cannot stop progress. We must recognize that we are living in the machine age. We must deal with the fact that the economic status of the workingman has been profoundly affected. There is today a labor-saving device for every branch of industry. This condition has displaced millions of working men and women and has been one of the primary causes for the serious unemployment condition of this present day.

The workingman is not responsible for these present conditions of unemployment. The dynamics of a mechanical age is the cause. In 1929, the last so-called "normal year", the railroads of this country were operated by 250,000 fewer employees than in 1920. Since the depression, commencing in 1930, several hundred thousand railroad employees have been added to this list. Synchronized music has displaced over 9,000 musicians, many of them artists of notable talent. The number of mechanics employed in the manufacture of automobiles, including bodies and parts, between the prosperous years of 1925 and 1927 was decreased by 56,796. Still further decreases were made between the years 1926 and 1929, regardless of the fact that more automobiles were manufactured in 1929 than in 1926.

In the men's-clothing trade a power machine operated by not more than two persons displaced 200 skilled clothing cutters. In the iron and steel industry, on an average, 1 man now does the work that 45 men used to. On a trans-Atlantic liner there used to average 120 stokers; now 3 men do this work, dressed in spotless white, by merely turning a valve. The New Edison Co. has installed an automatic mechanism that operates an electric distributing station which supplies enough power to light 300,000 homes without one human being in the plant; an operator 3 miles away handles the switch and has perfect control at all times.

Students of agriculture tell us that while it took 3 hours of human labor to produce a bushel of wheat in 1900, in 1932 three minutes of machine labor will do the same thing. The relation is 50 to 1. Thus mass production, stimulated by mechanical invention, has taken its toll of man power in every industry. This displacement must be compensated for by a 30-hour working week to avoid the disaster of widespread unemployment on the one hand and overproduction on the other.

Thus, mass production stimulated by mechanical invention has taken its toll of man power in every industry. This displacement must be compensated for by a 30-hour working week if we are to avoid complete disaster.

Are we to go on displacing men, taking millions of workers out of the consuming market, constantly increasing our facilities and powers to produce without developing a market corresponding with our ability to produce? There was not enough attention paid in the past to the market situation, the adjustments that were necessary to absorb these men who were constantly being displaced. We have absolutely failed to adjust working time corresponding with our increase in the facilities of production. We have gone ahead attempting to work 6 days a week and 8, 10, or 12 hours per day under the new order just as we did under the old. We have not enough work to keep men employed 6 days per week, 8 hours per day and 10 hours per day. That is out of the question because of the wonderful mechanical development that has made men more efficient. Furthermore, there must be an adjustment of the working time in order to take up the slack of unemployment caused by the depression.

Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, in testifying before the Committee on Labor on the 30-hour week bill, stated as follows:

> Even though we could by the exercise of some magic wand establish the favorable conditions of prosperity of 1929 on an 8-, 10-, or 12-hour day, as prevailed, and the long work week, we could not absorb more than 55 percent of our unemployed, and that we would still be menaced by a large standing army of unemployed. It is simply impossible to reemploy the idle unless you reduce the hours of labor. Mechanization and increased use of power has effected that condition. This is the basis of it all.
> Yes; I have repeatedly said that we must either bring the unemployed back into employment by reducing the hours of labor, making such adjustments as are necessary, so that these adjustments will conform with the increased efficiency of the workers, caused by the mechanization of industry, or support a large, permanent, standing army of unemployed. Idle workers must be given employment through the 6-hour day and 5-day week, or we must support a large standing army of unemployed.

Mr. Chairman, these economic changes and this displacement of man power call for important readjustments.

There are two schools of thought dealing with the problem. First, there are certain groups of industrialists and employers of labor who, for their own selfish interests, are taking advantage of unemployment and the surplus in the labor market to bring down the standards of wages and of living. These misguided men, referred to as cutthroat industrialists, if permitted to do so, would gladly reduce all labor to the condition of serfdom which unfortunately exists in certain sections of this country.

In contrast to this selfish school of thought, we have the advanced humanitarianism fostered by American working men and women who maintain that one of the primary functions of the Government is to protect life and make it easier and happier for the toiling masses who are so deeply responsible for the production of this Nation's wealth. Fortunately for all of us, the example of this intelligent humanitarianism is felt in many spheres of industry; thank Heaven, there are many enlightened employers in this country who are working with public and civic bodies and with organized labor to stem the tide of reaction.

Mr. Chairman, I have referred to the Black-Connery 30-hour week bill. I do not hesitate to state that the Senate bill 158, unanimously reported to this House by the Committee on Labor, to which it was referred but which did not contain a public works and construction program, was otherwise a far superior and better balanced bill than the bill now under consideration. The Black-Connery bill gave protection to American industry and American labor and protection which unfortunately is not provided for in the bill under consideration. This failure has been referred to by no less authority than Bernard M. Baruch, and I quote from an article published in the San Francisco Examiner, under date of March 20, as follows:

> American industry must have more protection against cheap imports if it is to succeed in creating jobs and raising wages, Bernard M. Baruch said tonight before the Brookings Institute.
> Baruch, who headed the War Industries Board during the war, praised the present Federal emergency program for economic recovery, but warned the assembled economists to "examine carefully" recent and pending legislation designed to place all American industry under Federal regimentation.
> Baruch questioned the effectiveness of controlling industry, fixing minimum prices and establishing higher wages for more employees, and at the same time letting down the bars to cheap foreign importations by reducing tariffs.

Mr. Chairman, the American manufacturer and the American workingman is entitled to the same protection given the farmer in the emergency agricultural relief bill, which passed the House on March 20, the Senate April 28, and was approved by the President on May 12. This applies to interstate or foreign commerce, as follows:

> The processing tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the first domestic processing of the commodity, whether of domestic production or imported.

In further proof of this necessity of protecting American industry and American labor, I quote again from the statement of Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor:

> The opportunity to ship into this country goods manufactured at a price with which no American manufacturer can compete can be met in two ways: First, by the provision in the Connery bill; and, second, by a countervailing tax. In my judgment, no tariff can be sufficiently high to meet the debased foreign currency conditions in Europe and other foreign countries. That cannot be fixed by a rigid tariff act.

The rule under which this bill is being considered does not permit amendments except by the committee which has the bill in charge. I sincerely hope that the committee, in fairness to American manufacturers, will amend the bill under consideration by adding thereto what was known as section 8 of the Black-Connery bill unanimously reported to the House by the Committee on Labor, which reads as follows:

> To insure a purchasing power on the part of the American consumers the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, while this act continues in force and effect, to prohibit the entry of foreign-made goods, which goods are similar or comparable to goods produced in the United States of America, if such foreign-made goods are entered at total landed costs which are less than American cost of production of similar or comparable American-made goods. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make findings of the cost of production, and his decision shall be final.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, coming from northwestern Pennsylvania, the tax features of this bill are of peculiar interest to me and my people and especially the additional tax imposed upon gasoline, for it was there that oil was first discovered and the second largest industry in the United States had its birth.

About 1 year ago, as an emergency measure, Congress placed a Federal tax of 1 cent per gallon upon gasoline. This bill proposes to add three quarters of a cent. This is a field of taxation that was preempted by the States back in 1919, when the State of Oregon imposed a tax of 1 cent per gallon. It is a matter about which various States have gone wild. I wonder if you know to what extent gasoline is taxed by the States?

I have here the rates for Harrison County, Miss., where there is a State tax of 6 cents per gallon, a county tax of 3 cents per gallon, and to this would be added the Federal tax of 1¾ cents per gallon, making a total of 10¾ cents.

The average price of gasoline received by the manufacturer during 1932 was 4 cents per gallon. This represents a tax of more than 372 percent.

All of us, from city and from country, have the interests of the farmer at heart. The Federal tax of 1 cent per gallon, imposed as an emergency measure a year ago and to continue for 1 year only, has cost the country $135,000,000, and as the farmers consume one fourth of the motor fuel of the country, the farmers contributed $33,750,000 of this tax. The additional tax of three fourths of 1 cent, proposed in this bill, would raise $92,000,000 more, and the farmers would pay $23,000,000 more in motor-fuel taxes. The farmer's tax upon his motor fuel would be increased 68 percent.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a table showing taxes levied on gasoline by the various States and to also include therein certain testimony given before the House Ways and Means Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. I have prepared from the records of the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Roads, and will insert at this point in my remarks a table showing the rates of tax imposed by the various States upon motor fuel as of December 31, 1932, the gross receipts from such tax, the amount in gallons of fuel consumed in the United States during that year, and the percentage of change in consumption:

An inspection of this table discloses that gasoline pays a sales tax in every State of the Union and in the District of Columbia, at rates varying from 2 to 7 cents per gallon, and that 33 of the States have fixed this sales tax at from 4 to 7 cents per gallon. In other words, 33 of the States impose a sales tax upon gasoline of 100 or more percent. In addition to these sales taxes imposed by all of the States, the cities and counties of some of them have imposed like levies for their use, with the result that in some localities gasoline pays a sales tax in excess of 372 percent.

The disproportionate tax burden imposed upon the gasoline and motor-vehicle industries is apparent when we consider that in 1930, before the Federal Government began to tax gasoline, the two industries mentioned paid more than $1,000,000,000 to the States, while the total State revenue receipts for that year were $2,243,110,000. In other words, the motor vehicle and gasoline industries paid 37.9 percent of the total revenue receipts of all the States in 1930.

This table shows that the consumption of gasoline in 1932 declined in 46 of the States in amounts as high as 22.2 percent, the average decline for all the States and the District of Columbia being 7½ percent. Manifestly, the larger part of this decline is due to the economic condition of the country, but the dire effect of excessive taxation is shown by the fact that by far the greatest decline in consumption was in those States which imposed the highest gasoline taxes.

A decline in the consumption of gasoline reflects not only a decrease in the use of motor vehicles but also a decline in their manufacture and sale. Motor-vehicle registrations in 1932 declined at the rate of 200,000 per month. As in the case of the decline in consumption of gasoline, we must recognize that the major cause is the economic situation; nevertheless, excessive gasoline sales taxes, excessive automobile and accessories sales taxes, and excessive automobile and operators' license fees contribute largely to this result.

Furthermore, excessive gasoline taxes, and all gasoline taxes over 3 cents per gallon are excessive, invite the bootlegging of gasoline, with the consequent loss of all revenue and the demoralization of honest prices to the consumer. The gasoline bootlegger flourishes in those States imposing excessive taxes, and the honest dealers there can meet the unfair competition only by offering an inferior grade of gasoline at a lower price. Thus honesty is penalized and fraud rewarded.

The net result to the oil industry is a decreased demand for its products and at decreased prices. The cost of production of oil in western Pennsylvania is quite accurately estimated at $2.50 per barrel, while the price received for it, at the time I am speaking, is $1.32 per barrel.

To increase this Federal tax by three fourths of a cent will tend to further depress this price. In my congressional district the average oil well produces daily about as much oil as a good Holstein cow produces milk, or about one eighth of a barrel. Most of these wells are owned by independent producers, many of them by farmers; and many of the owners are now almost bankrupt. They cannot operate their wells much longer at such a loss.

Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, and West Virginia produce what is known as the Pennsylvania grade of oil, the quality of which is unequaled in the world. Will you Representatives from Ohio take notice? Your State has 35,000 producing oil wells, which is one ninth of the total number in the United States. Their average daily production is less than one half barrel. Will you Representatives of the other oil-producing States take notice? There are 350,000 producing oil wells in the United States, 250,000 of which produce less than 1 barrel per day. These "stripper wells" are the backbone of the oil industry and relief in the form of higher prices must come to their owners or they will be abandoned; once abandoned they will be lost forever, an irreparable damage to the country, for the small revenue each produces would not justify reopening.

Time will not permit me to discuss another injustice of this bill, namely, increasing by 50 percent the tax upon small incomes. If enacted in law, this provision will measurably decrease the attendance next year at American colleges and universities.

The remedy for the tax injustices of the bill was suggested by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee last Friday. I quote his testimony, from pages 113–114 of the hearings:

Mr. GREEN. Now we come to the sales tax. Labor has always been, and is uncompromisingly, opposed to the principle of the sales tax. We feel that it is a form of taxation that is unjust in operation and that it bears more heavily upon the masses of the people than it does upon those who are best able to bear the taxation burden.

We are so fundamentally opposed to it that under ordinary circumstances we would object strongly to the imposition of a sales tax, particularly if this sales tax were to be imposed for the purpose of raising revenue to pay the ordinary running expenses of the Government. You will always find labor before committees and in the halls of Congress opposing the enactment of such legislation as that.

Speaking now for myself, because I cannot represent all the views of all our labor representatives, since many of them differ from me, I have arrived at this opinion only after careful thought and study: That is, that if this character of tax is imposed for the purpose of raising this money in order to drain the pools of unemployment, and to get people out of their suffering, after 4 years of the very greatest human distress conceivable because of unemployment, and if it is the intention to spend the money thus raised in the towns and in the cities, as I have suggested, in order to tackle the problem of unemployment at the home, then I would be willing, as a representative of labor, to favor the imposition of a sales tax for the purpose of raising that money, but with this proviso, that it should be carefully safeguarded and made to apply only in this emergency, and to automatically end when the purpose of this bill has been served.

I agree with Mr. Green, but, going further, I propose that food, clothing, and medicine be exempted from such tax. A general manufacturers' sales tax (exempting food, clothing, and medicine) of only 1.8 percent would produce the needed revenue, and its imposition would fall so lightly upon all that it would be felt by none. What sound argument can be advanced against a proposition so fair, and so satisfactory to the accredited spokesman for labor? What sound argument can be advanced in favor of crushing sales taxes upon a few selected industries, at rates as high as 372 percent?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, on the bill itself no man knows whether the enactment of the measures means that it is merely a temporary program which leads us out of our present distress back to traditional Americanism, or leads us on to greater fields of communism. At the same time, no man knows whether standing still now will save traditional Americanism or lead us on into still greater economic and social chaos. For my part, I choose to take the bill. [Applause.]

The subject which I wish to discuss now primarily is the tax feature. The proposed motion to recommit, offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, will, if accepted to this bill, in my honest judgment, do almost as much for America as the bill itself. We know that credit has been unduly contracted. Congress has been responsible for part of this. A year ago, at the very time when we needed check circulation more than anything else, Congress enacted a check tax and undertook to penalize by millions of dollars each year the very thing which we needed most. Give us the Bacharach amendment and lift from America the check tax and much will be gained in credit circulation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In connection with the statement the gentleman is just making, let me say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] has recently announced that he expects to offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Irrespective of which motion is finally submitted, I am for the motion that is submitted, whether it be the McCormack amendment or the Bacharach amendment. [Applause.]

Let me go a little further. Lift from the oil industry of America the gasoline tax and, mayhap, you have done much for one great industry. Lift from the automobile industry the discriminatory tax placed upon it and, mayhap, you have done much. It is written in the scheme of things that you cannot penalize two great industries like the oil industry and the automobile industry without every other industry in the United States paying a penalty. There is some justice yet in the economic world, if there is none in the political world.

When we have done this there is only one place to turn and that is to a manufacturers' sales tax, with drugs, food, and clothing exempt.

There is no good reason, ordinarily, presented against this tax. Usually it is fear, a sort of political fear, which is ill-founded either in politics or in reason. The opposition to a general sales tax always promises, as a substitute, to collect the needed tax off of the rich, and yet the bill itself answers that statement. This bill which the committee has brought in does not collect it from the incomes of the rich, but collects it from the earnings of the great middle class in this country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, you gentlemen who are lawyers will remember better than I do the famous case of McCulloch against The State of Maryland, in which Chief Justice Marshall told us, and truly told us, "the power to tax involves the power to destroy, and the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create."

It is well that we should consider carefully these significant words.

The issuance of this huge amount of Government bonds to pay the interest and sinking fund of which about $220,000,000 additional tax must be placed on the American taxpayer each year is, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] remarked, giving us war taxes in peace times.

I shall vote to recommit this bill in favor of a sales tax.

We have already spent in public works nearly one half billion dollars with no very marked increase in employment. England has found that the extensive building of public works did not help unemployment.

Mr. MacDonald wrote as follows regarding public works:

After the most careful examination of all the relevant considerations, the Government has, however, reached a definite decision to discontinue the policy of attempting to deal with unemployment by a system of state-assisted relief works.

Experience has, however, shown that the amount of employment provided by the vast expenditure on these schemes has been very small in comparison with the total volume of unemployment and that the policy is completely unequal to the task of dealing with unemployment on a large scale.

Despite putting in hand of relief works of an estimated value of nearly $923,000,000, the greatest number of persons directly employed on works falling under the main classes of relief works at any time was 114,000.

I voted for the economy bill, because I believed the balancing of our Budget would restore confidence and thus reduce unemployment.

As Dr. Butler said—

> The practical and straightforward way to balance the Budget is not to tax more, but to spend less. The real slogan of the people of the United States should be "Stop spending our money."

It is undoubtely true that when taxation rises to a point beyond the capacity to pay, the revenue falls instead of increasing, as shown by the tax on real estate in our large cities.

The people of this country are industrious, intelligent, and very resourceful. They do not need to be controlled by dictatorial power in order to help stimulate business recovery. Their own spirit of enterprise will bring it about as soon as conditions warrant. Nor can we hope to have a return to normalcy all at once. It is bound to be a slow process, responding only to patient treatment. The best stimulus we can give is a reduction of taxation, especially on real estate and rents, and in so doing help the farmer, the homeowner, and the poor man all together, and then prosperity will return slowly, perhaps, but surely.

Conditions which prevailed in England after the Napoleonic wars were very similar to those of today, namely: (1) Trade depression, (2) unemployment, (3) wages at starvation point, (4) heavy taxation, (5) huge debt and recurring deficits, (6) declining exports and imports. Finally in 1841, Sir Robert Peel came into power and applied really sound remedies.

In the fifties and sixties Gladstone followed on. Under the magic stimulus of public economy, reduced taxation, balanced budgets, trade began to advance by leaps and bounds.

The facts are so plain and the precedent so clear and conclusive and the lessons so easy to learn that none of us can fail to see the importance of doing likewise today.

Let us have faith in our country, but let us not paralyze her by severe taxation.

As Lowell says in speaking of our Nation:

> They love her best who to themselves are true,
> And what they dare to dream of, dare to do.

[Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about the power Congress is proposing to give to a centralized group who will control the operation of this particular legislation. I have particularly in mind that class of industry in the United States which has been built up by careful planning, independently owned and controlled, where the lives of men have been devoted to that industry. These industries have been built up, scattered all over the country, and are the backbone of American industry in the United States. I am not referring to the big trusts. The financial groups that we hear so much about these days have time and again tried to get control, to worm themselves into these industries and take them away from the owners, the people who have built them up.

You are creating an organization here now that is going to be able to control these industries. Under the operation of the provisions of this law, they may be forced to consolidate with competitors that are owned and controlled by the very group of people who have been trying to break into privately owned industries. Big business wants to swallow independent business that remains in the United States. Big private banking houses in New York want these small independent profit-making industries.

I am wondering what these industries that have been built up by the owners with their own money, with genius and brains, who have treated the employees properly and are the very lifeblood of many small communities, are going to say or do when they are called before this board and are told that they no longer can control their own business, and that, unless they obey the dictates of big bankers and big business, their main competitors, they will have to consolidate their business with other groups of business people—these other groups of people may be the very persons who have been trying for years to take the business away from them.

That is one of the dangers that I see in the bill. Further than that, I want to say to you and the administration that this department of Government which you are setting up here today must not be managed by the type of men we are hearing about who are controlled by the financial group appearing and other similar groups of New York bankers who will later appear for examination before the Senate Banking Committee at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.] This administration has got to purge itself of that J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Speyer & Co., Warburg group of private bankers' control or you are going to have revolution in the United States. It cannot continue any longer.

This is to be an institution for the control of industry, all industry, privately owned industry. You have already given control of the railroads, you have already given control of the farming industry, you have given control of the finances of the country to the banker groups.

I simply want to warn the administration that this cannot continue. The people have rights in these United States, and when they awake they will take their rights.

Now, in the few brief moments that still remain I want to refer to the tax features provided in the bill.

I need not tell you that I have been seeking for a long time to get the Income Tax Division of the Treasury Department to collect taxes due the United States. If you would, if this Congress would report out a resolution of investigation which will result in unearthing the reasons why the Income Tax Division does not function we might collect hundreds of millions of dollars that are actually due at this time.

Who is holding up my resolution to do this? What must be done to get action in this House to make the Income Tax Bureau of the United States Treasury do its duty, and collect taxes that are being fraudulently withheld? Is it that these tax-racketeering lawyers and certified public accountants are so strongly intrenched, or are the Mellons, Morgans, and Dohertys so strong politically, that they can even reach the leadership in this House?

Of course, I had every evidence in the Hoover Administration that Morgan, Mills, Ballantine, and Burnet had no intention of interfering with this ring of income-tax racketeers. We were all led to understand that when the Administration changed the money changers would be thrown out of the temple, but they are still permitted to operate and apparently are being protected, and the regime is to be perpetuated. The definite proof of this is the appointment of Dean G. Acheson, formerly of the law firm of Covington, Burling and Rublee, Union Trust Building, Washington, D.C. This firm of lawyers, with whom Mr. Acheson was connected, are the attorneys for Price, Waterhouse and Co., a British accounting house and one of the largest practitioners in income-tax matters before the Treasury Department. They represent hundreds of the leading taxpayers.

On November 21, 1931, I asked Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, to disbar this company from practicing before the Treasury Department in connection with any income-tax or other matters on evidence that I was submitting to the Department. I pointed out to Mr. Mellon that over a period of years this accounting firm, in collusion with large taxpayers, had been defrauding the United States Government in the receipt of taxes due the Government and suggested that each one of this firm's clients' tax accounts be completely audited and prosecuted. Did Mr. Mellon do this? He did not. On the contrary, in a letter to me under date of November 24, 1931, he defended the activities of this concern, and on December 1, 1931, I sent him additional definite information as to the fraudulent practices of Price, Waterhouse & Co., and submitted definite cases of tax violations running into tens of millions of dollars and called attention for immediate action on account of possible running of the statute of limitations. On December 9, 1931, I again called his attention to these violations and referred him to a conspiracy action that had been entered into between the representatives of these taxpayers, the acting Attorney General of the United States, and himself. Mr. Mellon refused to take any action looking toward the prosecution of these tax violations.

On March 26, 1932, I directed a letter to Ogden L. Mills asking for a report inasmuch as 6 months had elapsed since I had notified the Department of this irregularity, and on April 1, Mr. Ogden L. Mills, the then Secretary of the Treasury, replied that the Department had the matter under consideration.

On June 4, 1932, I introduced a resolution which was referred to the Rules Committee. Extensive hearings were held but Speaker Garner and the Rules Committee failed to carry out their agreement to report favorably on this rule at the last session of Congress.

On May 5, 1933, I sent the following letter to Hon. William H. Woodin, Secretary of the Treasury:

MAY 5, 1933.

HON. WILLIAM H. WOODIN,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On March 26, 1932, I addressed the enclosed letter to Hon. Ogden L. Mills, then Secretary of the Treasury. His answer is also enclosed. This matter concerns substantial amounts due to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. David A. Olson has filed several cases of tax evasion with the Bureau of Internal Revenue. These cases have been in the hands of the Bureau for more than a year. There has been much correspondence and conversation about these cases, but to date no one has been able to secure from the Bureau or the Treasury any definite statement as to the disposition of these matters.

Officials of all parties are working earnestly to evolve means to meet the Government's pressing need of funds, and it seems to me that definite steps should be taken to determine what sum in evaded taxes can be collected in the Olson cases and even more important that those sums be collected and made available for the Treasury.

It is with the hope that you will agree with this statement of the Nation's financial condition that I am addressing you with this request for information.

Has the Bureau of Internal Revenue completed its investigation of these cases or of any of them? What sum has been collected?

What sum of money has been discovered to be due to the Government and from whom?

I shall appreciate your early reply.

Sincerely yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

Up to this time I have not had the courtesy of a reply. But during this period of time one of the attorneys for Price, Waterhouse & Co., as heretofore stated, has been made an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, succeeding A. A. Ballantine. His particular duties are the Income Tax Division of the Treasury Department.

Mr. Acheson apparently has had, or may still have, very interesting clients, as is indicated by a letter from a resident of California that has just come to me. In referring to his appointment as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, this correspondent says: "He is the man who appeared recently on the Pacific coast representing a syndicate of New York bankers in connection with the purchase of Russian bonds at a discount." It was said that this New York syndicate was in possession of special information in regard to the recognition of Russia by the United States, and it was indicated that on the basis of this inside information this New York syndicate was attempting to buy up from the present unfortunate holders of Russian securities in the United States these bonds.

The House of Representatives should know who Mr. Acheson is and whom he represents. The hearings before the Senate Banking Committee have disclosed the fact that he is on the preferred list of friends of J. P. Morgan & Co. I am sure that the Membership of this House will understand how impossible it is to expect that these fraudulent tax cases, which I am insisting be investigated, can be investigated and the taxes collected and the taxpayers dealt with in the same manner that the tax-evasion case of Charles E. Mitchell, president of the National City Bank, is being dealt with. I am definitely calling this serious matter to the attention of the administration; and their action in regard to the retention of Mr. Acheson in the Treasury will disclose whether or not the administration intends to deal with these fraudulent tax cases or whether they are going to respond to the demands of political and financial pressure that can be brought to bear by the Mellons; the Morgans; the Kuhn, Loebs; and the H. L. Dohertys.

These influences are now trying to control the appointment and confirmation of Guy T. Helvering, of Kansas, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This appointment should not be confirmed by the United States Senate.

The public-utility interests, of the type of H. L. Doherty, are doing everything that they possible can to secure the appointment of Mr. Helvering for this position. I have already shown the Members here that the tax returns of H. L. Doherty, of Cities Service, one of the largest public utilities, should be investigated. It is significant, too, when we understand that Mr. Helvering's appointment is satisfactory to the attorneys practicing before the Income Tax Division of the Treasury Department.

I am reliably informed that Mr. A. W. Mellon has been in Washington the past few days in consultation with Mr. Acheson and the attorneys for Price, Waterhouse & Co. It is not surprising that Mr. Mellon would be here in Washington at this time during the questioning of the members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.

One of the interesting developments of this investigation discloses the fact that the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. is a copartnership, each partner having an interest in the assets of the copartnership. Therefore it becomes necessary upon a partner leaving the firm or a new partner coming in to estimate the value of the partnership assets as the basis upon which such incoming or outgoing partner may be protected in his investment.

Under Mr. Morgan's statement when Mr. S. Parker Gilbert came into the J. P. Morgan firm, he assumed a sale of the assets of the Morgan firm and thereby reached a valuation predicted upon the sale of the Morgan firm assets. This assumption is not an actual sale but is an assumed price on the assets of the Morgan firm that is fixed by the Morgan firm and whether the property is purchased or sold, the completed transaction is based upon what may be termed the value fixed by Morgan himself, and is not established by an actual sale of the property as contemplated under the income tax law. The whole procedure is one of fiction, the whole price fixed on sale and purchase is fiction, the assumption as a result of the sale is fiction, the estimated losses of $21,000,000 deducted from the income of the firm for the year involved is nothing but a fictitious transaction, which if tested in the courts by the Treasury, would be decided in favor of the Government. If Mr. Morgan is permitted to thus evade the law, which requires the actual sale of the property, then every farmer in the United States has a right to assume a purchase and sale of his own farm, when the farm prices are less than his cost, and make his own showing of the loss.

On the other hand, the merchant in the small town may estimate a sale of his merchandise for the same reason. He may make the sale of the merchandise at a price in his own mind, purely theoretical and imaginary, doing the same as Morgan does, and estimating the price at less than the wholesale price at which he purchased the goods, and can thereby deduct the estimated loss from the income-tax return on the basis of a sale having transpired.

It was mentioned by the Morgan partners that they had taken advantage of a loophole in the income tax law. I am reliably informed that there is no such loophole, and if the Treasury Department would only take action against the Morgan partners to collect the tax which was due for that calendar year, their action would be sustained by the courts.

In the case of Lazard-Freres, a New York partnership, the partners of that firm did the same thing in 1929, and I am reliably informed by a man who was present during this transfer that the attorneys in the case feared that if the Government took action to collect the tax, as legally due, they would be unable to successfully sustain their position in the courts.

Thus it is known to the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury that the question is a debatable one, and yet there has never been an attempt of the Treasury Department to settle the rule. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in the world that we are passing through the greatest revolution in our history, if not in the history of man; and this particular bill, so far as our country is concerned, is the keystone in this revolution. It is the most far-reaching in its effect upon the Constitution and upon the life of the people of any legislation that has been proposed here in these few weeks. For 150 years we have built up here on a distinctly American principle and American method the greatest and most beneficent social structure the world has ever seen. We are proposing now in 2 short months by a series of hastily conceived legislative acts to remake that entire structure. We do not know how this new machinery will work when it starts, but I am willing to predict that the unexpected byproducts of these laws will be as disastrous as they are surprising when they lay hold of the people.

I hope this bill when it is recommitted will come back with a sales tax. It seems to me a very simple proposition. Here is a man with an income of $10,000 a year. He wants to buy a new table or a new set of dishes or a new automobile, but he cannot do it because you are increasing his income tax. He is the one man who is paying now more than he ought to on his income. You are, in this bill, increasing his income tax 50 percent. If you will put a tax upon the automobile, on the table, on the set of dishes at the place where they are manufactured, he can pay that 1 or 2 percent, give work to the workman, give a profit to manufacturer, and everyone would be better off all around. For that reason I shall vote to recommit the bill and hope it will come back with the sales tax, and then, much against my will, I may vote for the bill itself.

It is time the American people waked up to what is happening here in Washington. We are, in this bill, not to mention a long list of others recently passed under gag rule, placing American industry under the President as dictator. We propose to regiment the American worker in such fashion as to denude him of his status as a free citizen. Under this bill no industry can start or function except it is licensed and controlled by a Washington bureaucrat. The bill scraps the safeguards of the Sherman Act. It makes mockery of the Civil Service law. It carries the American employer and employee farther toward the Russian system than has been attempted in any other country in the world.

We may be in the dawn of a new age. American individualism may be worn out as a mother of life. We may be under necessity of adopting a scheme of collectivism which, in essense, will turn out to be a denatured communism. But in doing all this as a substitute for the old American scheme of self-help, let us realize that we must say good-by to the Constitution under which we have advanced gloriously for 150 years.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain excerpts from the Supreme Court decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, in Scotland no Scotchman ever learned to swim until they began to build toll bridges in Scotland. The Scotchman then learned to swim as a matter of sheer necessity, and this particular bill pending in the House today is here, I would say, by the same token, namely, as a matter of strict necessity. I listened attentively to the learned argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], and I listened to the brilliant argument of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. However, when I hear such an argument affecting the constitutionality of a measure like this, or on the effect of this measure on our organic act, I recall that series of delightful essays Peter Finlay Dunn wrote some years ago in which he had Mr. Dooley talking to Mr. Hennesey. I remember the observation, and I think my friend from Pennsylvania will remember it also, that Dooley once made on the Supreme Court. He said that the Supreme Court always followed the election returns. Therefore I am not particularly mindful of the constitutionality of this measure, because I believe that ultimately the Supreme Court will follow the election returns and will place its stamp of approval upon this bill.

We are confronted with brilliant argument in behalf of and brilliant argument in opposition to this measure, and a cursory analysis will develop the fact that the argument in opposition proceeds from the head and the argument in behalf of the bill proceeds from the heart. I think of the millions who are unemployed today, the people about whom Abraham Lincoln was so solicitous, the people who were the chief solicitude of men like Robert Owen, the great humanitarian from England, and of St. Francis of Assisi, and of all those other great humanitarians who have gone down the corridors of time. These millions of distressed and unemployed are on the heart side of the pending measure. On the other side we have the cold intellect that is too often concerned with the pure logic of a measure of this kind, or with its constitutionality, or its propriety of form. It is exemplified by such renowned men as Herbert Spencer, Voltaire, Rosseau, and others, who were given to theoretical and abstract speculation upon the question of whether something fitted in with the inherent rights of human kind, or the theory and logic of individualism. But, Mr. Chairman, the mind is no match with the heart in persuasiveness; constitutionality is no match for compassion. I see nothing else to do except to cast my lot upon the humanitarian side and to vote for this bill, because the millions of unemployed feel that there is here a possibility of employment. To them it is a prophecy of hope, a harbinger of glad tidings, a note of cheer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 3½ minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like order for a moment while I disclose something that will be of interest to my friends on the Democratic side. Young James Roosevelt, the son of President Roosevelt, was on the air last night. He was in Boston. Here is what he said.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not now. He began his address with the history of the Morgan family and its close relationship with Boston and New England.

He defended "the unquestioned honesty and integrity of the House of Morgan and its head" over the radio last night, says the United Service. Now, this is the point that affects the Congress, your side and our side just the same. I am inclined to believe that when James Roosevelt made this address last night he had one of the tax bills now before us in his hand.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman read the rest of it?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Then give us the whole story.

Mr. BRITTEN. Certainly. He said:

> Most of you probably read the papers, where almost every headline told of the fact that J. P. Morgan paid no income tax in 1931 and 1932. That probably gave you a shock.
>
> The fault lies not with Mr. Morgan but with the law and those who draw the laws and allowed such a thing to be.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order. He is not confining himself to the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. The concluding remarks of young Roosevelt refer directly to the lax methods of our taxing laws, and the opportunities for evasion.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman. The debate must be confined to the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Very well. The trouble, my friends, Mr. Roosevelt says, is with Congress in allowing these things to prevail, and that is what I want to read. You should hear his own language.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not confining himself to the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. "In this bill," I am referring to the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Very well. I will confine my remarks to the bill.

In this bill we are going to perpetuate the very thing of which young Roosevelt complained. If the revenue-raising features of the bill had been written by J. Pierpont Morgan himself he could not have treated himself and his millionaire friends more generously. The so-called "little fellow" is again to carry the burden of taxation.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; not now.

This revenue-producing measure provides for a tax on incomes in the lower brackets where your friends and my friends are found, and which increases their taxes 3,000 percent, and only increases by 15 percent the upper brackets where the millionaires are found.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman knows of course that Mr. J. P. Morgan was able to charge——

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, the gentleman also is talking out of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the gentleman mentioned Mr. Morgan's name. He is a distinguished citizen of my city.

Mr. BRITTEN. Very well. Go ahead.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman knows that the reason Mr. Morgan could charge off his losses in a succeeding year was due to the Republican income tax bill of 1921. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. I hold no brief for any Republican bill, but I do expect the Democratic side of the House with its tremendous majority to legislate correctly now, and you are not doing it.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That amendment is in this bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. When they increase the dividend tax 3,000 percent in the lowest bracket and in the next bracket 1,500 percent, and then only increase your friend Morgan by 15 percent the bill should be amended or defeated. I shall vote to substitute a manufacturers' sales tax for all tax increases carried in the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. You are again playing into the hands of the plutocrats and millionaires. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply grateful to my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], our distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, for yielding me this opportunity to be heard in this debate.

When from the historic east steps of this Capitol, Franklin D. Roosevelt on the 4th day of last March took the solemn oath of President of these United States, he took over as he entered the White House a republic sick unto death. It had been sick for 12 years, during all of which time it was continually growing worse. First, it had been weakened by a severe attack of yellow jaundice it contracted from the Daugherty-Denby-Fall epidemic that broke out with the Harding administration; and while thus bed-ridden, it was robbed by the Doheny and Sinclair Capones of the Coolidge administration; and almost succumbed under the repeated surgical operations performed in the name of high finance by Dr. Mellon and Dr. Smoot-Hawley, with its disease so malignant and contagious that it and its markets were quarantined from the rest of the world. And during the last 4 years it has suffered stroke after stroke, and heart failure after heart failure from the boxes of orchids which the Hoover-Mellon-Meyer-Mills day and night nurses permitted the House of Morgan regularly to bedeck its orderlies with. Let me repeat that this patient, the Republic of the United States, was sick unto death on the 4th day of last March.

At least 12,000,000 heads of families were out of jobs. They had been out of jobs for months—aye, some of them had been out of jobs for several years. They were footsore and disconsolate. Their good wives and beloved little children were underfed, were underclothed, were not properly housed, were cold without fuel, had no money for medicine or doctors, and were desperate.

Twenty million farmers could not get the cost of production for their products, the result of 12 months of hard labor. They could not pay their taxes. They could not meet their installment notes. They could not pay their interest due. Mortgages on their homes were being foreclosed. Their households were being sold under the sheriff's hammer. Naturally they were desperate. They realized that they were virtually under bondage to the houses of Morgans.

Centuries ago Mellons and Morgans were called Pharaohs. The people of Israel were under bondage to them. A man named Moses was drafted to lead the people out of the wilderness. He was Israel's leader. He formulated plans and policies. He initiated a program. But here and there arose a grumbler. Each grumbler wanted to follow his own ideas. They wanted Moses to use the paths others had mapped out. Some expressed displeasure about one thing and some about another. This grumbler wanted to lead and not follow. That grumbler tried to throw obstacles in the way. But the people of Israel were in a terrible dilemma. They were milling around, lost in an interminable wilderness. They wanted to get out. They realized that the old, beaten paths used by others availed nothing. They were tired of the old deal. They wanted a new deal. So they finally had confidence and followed Moses. And he led them out. And the place he took them to was a land flowing with milk and honey.

The people of the United States last year were tired of being in bondage. They were tired of milling around lost in a wilderness. They were tired of the old deal. They wanted a new deal. So they drafted Franklin D. Roosevelt as their Moses to lead them out. He has accepted the leadership. The people have confidence in him. Oh, there are some grumblers. There always will be grumblers. But the people demand that their leader be allowed to frame his own plans and policies. They want him to map out the way. They want Congress to permit their leader to put into effect his program. It is Franklin D. Roosevelt's program the people want tried out.

This is the President's special session of Congress. It was called for the express purpose of giving the President a chance to put into effect his plans and policies. The President is mapping out the course. The paths are being chosen by the President. This bill is the President's bill. He has had it prepared, consistent with his own ideas. He says that it is a vital part of his program. He says that he needs it to bring about the early economic recovery of our sick Republic. We have tried out all the other doctors. They have failed. It is a new doctor now in charge of the patient. Already we see signs of hope. The sick Republic is no longer in a state of coma. It is rapidly convalescent. It is upon the medicine of Dr. Roosevelt that improvement has resulted. He says the patient needs more medicine. This bill is one of the doses. When I employ a doctor, I believe in taking his medicine. So I am going to vote for this bill (National Recovery Bill). For I am backing the President.

With the exception of one subject—bringing intoxicating liquor back, against which I am pledged to my constituents—I have backed the President in all of his plans and policies. With that exception I have given him 100-percent support.

And excepting intoxicating liquor, I am going to continue to give the President my hearty support 100 percent. He is the Moses who is leading us out of the wilderness. Unless some leader leads us out, we will die milling around with no chance to get out. And as surely as did Moses in the days of Pharaoh, I firmly believe that President Roosevelt is going to lead the sorely harassed people of America out of the wilderness into a land of milk and honey.

But the President needs your help and mine. He is human. His arms will grow tired. We all must help to hold up his arms. He needs our sympathy. He needs our encouragement. He needs our backing. We must keep the grumblers away. We must stand between him and the obstacles. We must help to conserve his physical and mental resources. We must not allow his strength to be taxed. We must keep from him all worries and harassments. We must let him realize that he has a solid phalanx behind him.

The President has frankly acknowledged that he will make some mistakes. Otherwise he would not be human. His administrators have made serious mistakes in doing injustices to our veterans, both of the World War and the Spanish-American War. But we all know that the President's heart is sympathetic. We know that he will not permit these injustices to stand. And our patriotic veterans all know now that a committee of this House is waiting on the President and is advising him of these injustices and is recommending to the President that they be remedied, and we who know the heart of the President know that he will remedy these injustices. And the veterans of the United States know that this Congress will do justice to them. So let no one speak unkindly of the President. Let no one prematurely misjudge him. Let all of us give him a chance. And he will lead us into the land flowing with milk and honey. I am back of the President 100 percent from now on, save and except on the one subject of intoxicating liquor. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, the bill known as "the public works bill" is one of the most important measures that has been recommended by the President at this session of Congress; and when it has been properly administered, will accomplish much for the relief of the unemployed and others who are in distress. It will go far toward restoring our country to a state of normalcy.

I will not undertake to discuss the bill generally but will only make a brief statement in regard to the provision for emergency highway construction. This bill provided that the aggregate amount expended on Federal-aid highways should not exceed $400,000,000. I conferred with and assisted the committee in the preparation of this bill, and as Chairman of the Committee on Roads of the House appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and submitted three important amendments which were accepted by the committee and afterward adopted by the House. One of these amendments is of great importance to the States having unexpended balances of Federal-aid funds and unable to match the same. This amendment authorizes the highway commissions of the States to use these funds with which to match these unobligated balances of Federal-aid funds without any contribution from the State. The State of Alabama, which I represent in part, will receive under the provision of this measure $8,500,000 Federal-aid funds and has a balance of $4,000,000 unexpended Federal-aid funds, which, under the provision of the amendment just referred to, will secure this additional $4,000,000 without any contribution from the State of Alabama. So if the Senate approves this bill as it will pass the House today and meets with the approval of the President, as it no doubt will, Alabama will receive during the next 2 years a total sum of $12,500,000 Federal-aid funds.

I am now and have been for many years a strong advocate of Federal-aid appropriations for roads. I have been a member of the Committee on Roads of the House continuously for the past 18 years, and for 3 years have been chairman of the committee. I assisted in the preparation of the original Federal-aid highway bill in 1916.

The following is a statement of the amounts which have been expended by the Federal Government since 1916:

Federal-aid expenditures from July 11, 1916, to June 1, 1933	$1,198,342,287
Emergency advance (act of Dec. 20, 1930)	79,203,719
Emergency construction highway funds (act of July 21, 1932)	46,438,819
Total to June 1, 1933	1,323,984,825

Miles improved with regular Federal aid and emergency funds to May 1, 1933, 105,834.

Under construction May 1, 1933, 14,209.

I am submitting, herewith, data relative to the expenditures by the States and local units during the period 1921 to 1931, also a statement relative to the present status of the Federal-aid highway system.

During the 11-year period, 1921 to 1931, the State highway departments of the several States expended about $7,000,000,000. During the same period the local units of government, such as counties, townships, and so forth, expended approximately $6,500,000,000, making a total of about $13,500,000,000 in the 11-year period.

The present approved Federal-aid highway system consists of about 205,000 miles. Of this mileage about 90,000 miles have been improved with a type of surfacing satisfactory for traffic. Some of this mileage, however, will require widening and other minor relocation changes to improve alinement. Many existing railroad grade crossings on this mileage should be eliminated and narrow bridges widened. About 104,000 miles have been improved by building to a standard grade and surfacing with a low-type surfacing. Much of this mileage will ultimately require raising to a higher standard of surfacing. The remaining 11,000 miles of the present system are unimproved. It is apparent, therefore, that much remains to be done to bring the Federal-aid system to a standard adequate for the traffic it is serving.

The foregoing gives you an idea of the wonderful progress made in highway construction since 1916. Two things have contributed very largely to create a sentiment for better highways—one, the coming of Federal-aid appropriation; and the other, the coming of automobiles and other motor vehicles.

The people of the Nation have demanded better highways and they will continue to do so until our great Federal-aid system has been completed.

There is a greater percentage of every dollar expended for highway construction that goes into labor than the expenditure of any other public funds. At least 85 to 90 percent of every dollar so expended goes into labor, including the preparation of the material, the transportation, and the actual building of the highways.

We cannot afford to permit the discontinuance of Federal-aid highway appropiration until our great system of highways is completed. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. LAMBETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LAMBETH. A little while ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said that this bill spells the end of individualism in America, meaning, I suppose, so-called "rugged" individualism. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts agree with me that the kind of individualism it seeks to end is "ragged" individualism?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I certainly agree with the gentleman. This bill will end "ragged" individualism by providing decent wages and outlawing "yellow dog" contracts and sweatshop conditions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this bill. I am going to vote against the sales-tax amendment which Mr. MCCORMACK will offer. [Applause.] I have the greatest respect and friendship for my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. I know he is sincere in offering his motion to recommit. But a sales tax is a tax on the poor. They try to camouflage it by calling it a painless tax. The idea of a sales tax is to chloroform or etherize the worker and his family as is illustrated in the extraction of a tooth by a dentist, the plan being first to render the patient unconscious and when he comes to he will find himself and his family carrying the burden of taxation for the Federal Government. They call it painless, meaning that the manufacturer will pass on the tax to the little fellow after he sells him the furniture or the products you have been talking about this afternoon, and the little fellow will be fleeced without knowing it. The wage earner and his family have to spend their all to live. Therefore, under this sales-tax amendment, they would have to pay a tax upon everything they would purchase. The moneyed man has a surplus after paying for his living expenses, and the sales tax does not apply to such surplus. I do not agree with the proposition of increasing the normal taxes on the middle classes. Nobody here likes that, but two wrongs do not make a right. When this bill gets over to the Senate, perhaps they will put in an excess-profits tax, thus providing a real cure for the situation, but they certainly will not put in a sales tax.

I hope the House will defeat the sales-tax proposition, and I hope the House will pass this bill.

Let me say in reference to the remark of my distinguished colleague from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], when I was asking for time on this bill that I ought to get my time from the Republican side, meaning, facetiously, I suppose, that that is where I belonged, on the Republican side, because I vote my convictions on all public questions and refuse to be led around by the nose. [Applause.] I want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that I do not yield to any Member of this House on my Democracy. I know I am just as good a Democrat as the gentleman from Arkansas, but if his idea of a Democrat means being a rubber stamp, then I am not that kind of a Democrat. [Applause.] I take my Democracy from Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, and they were not rubber stamps. [Applause.]

The Members of this House know that we had the 5-day week 6-hour day bill before the Committee on Labor, that we had long hearings on it and heard all the leading industrialists, farm groups, and labor leaders of the country give their views before this committee. That bill was reported unanimously and favorably by the Committee on Labor; but, as the Speaker said in a newspaper statement, it was put in the refrigerator, it was put on ice; in other words, the leadership would not allow it to come up for action by the House. Why? The best knowledge I have on the matter is that the President did not want the bill because it applied to foreign manufacturers as well as to American manufacturer, forcing the foreigner to work a 5-day week 6-hour day if he wanted to ship his goods to us in commerce. It would be obviously unfair to force our workers and manufacturers to work only 5 days and 6 hours daily and then allow the foreigners to work any number of hours at low wages and then compete in our markets with our own people. I want to call the attention of the Ways and Means Committee to the fact that in the present bill, on page 4, the following language occurs:

> Any violation of such standards in any transaction in or affecting interstate commerce shall be deemed an unfair method of competition in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended.

The Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, says that commerce means interstate and foreign commerce. So the same proposition is carried in this bill and the terms of this bill will apply to foreign manufacturers as did the terms of the Connery bill which they did not let us bring up. I call that to the attention of the House. The framers of this bill probably thought they were getting away from the foreign-import problem when they were getting away from the Connery bill, but it is in this bill, and I am mighty glad it is for the sake of protection for American workers, farmers, and manufacturers.

President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, said he favored this bill. Why? Because there is $3,300,000,000 for public works in the bill. The American Federation of Labor would rather have the Connery bill that the Committee on Labor brought out, but believing that no bill could get through Congress without the Presidential O.K.; and fearing to lose the public-works appropriation unless they favored the bill, Mr. Green went on record for this bill.

The American Federation of Labor at its last national convention went on record by a tremendous majority against the sales tax. Do not forget that. By a tremendous majority they voted against the sales tax.

When Mr. Green appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, he said that, as a last resort in an emergency, speaking for himself alone and not for the American Federation of Labor, he would accept a sales tax. I want the House to know this.

I hope this bill will pass. It does not do everything I want. I should like to see in it, as I say, an excess-profits tax. Under the rule adopted yesterday I cannot offer such an amendment. I hope they will put that on in the Senate. I hope in the Senate they will put in some provision that will make J. P. Morgan pay his income tax. I hope they will put in something over there that will protect the little fellow. We cannot get everything we want, but in this bill there is a minimum-wage provision and there is the abolition of the "yellow dog" contract, and the elimination of sweatshops, and let us hope that when we come back in January we will abolish child labor as we did in our bill, and do some more things for the benefit of labor in the United States.

In conclusion may I state that one of my reasons for supporting this bill is that it was sponsored in the Senate by Senator WAGNER, of New York, who has sought constantly to improve the conditions of labor, who has continually championed the cause of the under dog. Knowing him as I do, I cannot feel that this bill, which he sponsored after consultation with the White House experts, is entirely satisfactory to him; but I do know that he is trying to help labor in this bill, and, with that object in mind, I am in hearty accord with him and I feel sure that this bill will do much to control the big monied interests of this country and bring about at least partial justice to the exploited, crushed masses of the workers of the Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. Under the rule the bill is considered as having been read. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, to offer committee amendments.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON: On page 12, in line 8, after the word "agreement", insert the words "or any commitment to bid upon or purchase bonds."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply to make the language in this part of the bill conform to language in other parts of the bill. It is just a perfecting amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON: On page 13, line 17, after the word "units", insert the following: "Provided further, That this section shall not be applicable to public works under the jurisdiction or control of the Architect of the Capitol or of any commission for which such Architect is the contracting and/or executive officer."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to leave jurisdiction of the improvements in the Capitol or Senate and House Office Buildings with the Architect of the Capitol or with congressional commissions, where it is under present law.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON: On page 13, line 18, strike out the word "quickly", and in line 19 insert the word "quickly" before the parenthesis.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in a short time we are going to have to pass upon a motion to recommit. I am not going to discuss the committee amendment before us, but if someone does not interpose objection to my addressing myself to the motion to recommit, I want to remind the Members of the House sitting in Committee of the Whole of some facts with reference to this sales-tax proposition, for there will not be opportunity to discuss it when it is offered.

I am going to skip by the alternatives we had before us, the alternative of paying the cost of this public-works program by issuing new currency instead of by inflicting new taxes on the people to pay the interest on tax-exempt bonds and to amortize them. Our choice today lies between two alternatives, and limited as we are by the rules, they are these:

On the one side a tax upon the man of modest means, a heavy increase in his income taxes and almost no increase in the taxes of the wealthy. No substantial change, mind you, in the tax structure with respect to the surtaxes on the large incomes or the large inheritances, but a sharp increase in the normal tax rates on the modest income and a continuation of the nuisance taxes.

This is one picture; the other alternative is a tax upon the necessities of life, disguise it as you may, a tax upon the sales, a tax upon consumption, a tax that is directly in the face of and in contradiction of everything the administration is trying to do in the way of increasing the purchasing power of the people and in building up their aggregate national income and restoring values and inflating, if you choose to call it that, or expanding our resources and our earning power.

This is the choice you are going to be faced with in just a short time and I hope the lines will stand firm. I hope you will defeat the amendment that is going to be brought in; and for myself, in attempting to give my assistance to the defeat of that amendment, I am going to go farther and say that I regretfully cast my vote in opposition to the entire measure, not because I am not heartily for a public-works program, not that I do not trust the President of the United States in his effort to control and revive activity in industry, but because I feel that we should have had a chance to bring in amendments to all three titles of this measure, a chance which we were denied when the rule was voted yesterday, despite the opposition that we were able to bring against it.

So when this choice comes to take a sales tax or to take the tax which is in the measure at the present time, I shall choose the lesser of two evils, and trust that another body will make corrections in the measure which will permit us to vote for the conference report when it is brought in. But I shall stand against the sales tax that grinds down the earning power of the people and works directly against any program of recovery or inflation, to which we have been committed by earlier measures which have been crowded through this body.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON: On page 15, strike out lines 19 to 23, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 204. (a) For the purpose of providing for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, the President is authorized to make grants to the several States in an aggregate amount of $400,000,000, to be expended in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Highway Act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, except as provided in this title, as follows."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment suggested by the Chief of the Bureau of Roads and also requested by the Committee on Roads of the House.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield? When was that request made by the Committee on Roads of the House? I happen to be a member of the committee and I know nothing about it.

Mr. RAGON. It was made last Saturday.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The chairman and two other members of the committee appeared before our subcommittee.

The amendment provides that the disbursement of the $400,000,000 for public roads shall be made through the same channels as the appropriation for roads under the present program, except as otherwise provided in this measure.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This is not the amendment that changes the allocation of funds?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; it is not.

THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT WAS NOT FOUNDED ON THE PRINCIPLES OF A DICTATORSHIP

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, quite a number of Members who wanted to express themselves on this legislation, because of the limited time given for debate, were not permitted to do so.

UNITED STATES HAS GREAT RESOURCES

I think that America is such a great and wonderful country, with such boundless resources and such a high degree of training and intelligence, that it would be practically impossible to keep it from reviving under any kind of management under which the Government might be administered. I do not believe that with the great people we possess throughout the length and breadth of our country and the great natural resources the United States could continually be kept in the condition we find it today by the administration of economic affairs through rules laid down by men. I am certain we will come out of this condition, regardless of the type of legislation proposed today or any other legislation which does not seek to bind us hand and foot into a permanent condition of slavery.

THE UNITED STATES WILL RECOVER

We are going to come out of all this, regardless of what laws we enact or regardless of the fact that we do not enact any laws, because the people of the country are great.

I think that our Nation and our Government has been built up on certain fundamental principles, but I do not believe these principles will be preserved long if we continue to enact this kind of legislation, which is absolutely in contravention of those principles.

The Chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. POU, who has served 32 years in this House, said yesterday on the floor of this House: "Under this bill the President of the United States is made a dictator of industry."

Dictatorship is not in accord with the spirit of Americanism. A dictatorship was not one of the principles on which America was founded, and for that reason, given by those who advocate this legislation, I am compelled to vote against it.

When I go out of Congress I will go out with a good conscience and a feeling that I have served my country the best I could in keeping the oath that I took when I became a Member of this House. [Applause.]

I am one of those who believe "that the powers not delegated by the Constitution of the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." I think when we abandon the Constitution we are abandoning the fundamentals on which we built this great Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I should like to ask the gentleman, whom I have learned to admire very much, and whose ability I appreciate, how, in his judgment, the public-building program could be carried out?

ABANDON THE GOLD STANDARD AND GIVE US MORE MONEY

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman and others know that for 2 years I have advocated this course by the Government: That if we go off the gold standard and put more money into circulation and take the people who manipulate the bank credit of the country for their selfish interests out of control of the Government, we will come out of this depression without surrendering the liberties of the people. [Applause.]

NATIONAL DEBT WILL BE INCREASED $10,000,000,000

The national debt of the United States is being increased at a very rapid rate. Before the program of expenditure which has been outlined by the President and his advisers is completed the national debt will have been increased ten or twelve billion dollars from what it was at the low level in 1930. It is presumed that this added debt will be financed by the sale of Government bonds. If so, then the interest burden that will be placed upon the taxpayers of the Nation will be something like $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 annually. These bonds will be tax exempt, so that their holders will pay no taxes to help meet this enormous increased burden of interest that must be met by the country.

THE FARMER WHO BORROWED AND SPENT

Our Nation is proceeding very much like a farmer who has a farm not heavily burdened with debt but no money. This farmer decided that he would place a $4,000 mortgage on his farm and secure some immediate cash. This he does. Then persuades himself to believe that he has reached a streak of prosperity because he has come into possession of ready money by mortgaging his farm at a high rate of interest. This farmer takes the money, goes out and clears useless tracts of land, digs ditches in uncultivated portions of his land, and makes extensive but useless improvements in order to give employment to idle labor on his farm. He wakes up near the end of his heyday of extravagance and expenditure to find that he has spent his patrimony like the proverbial drunken sailor. And the only thing he has left is the farm heavily laden with debt, a mortgage with maturing interest, and ditches he does not need.

He finds that it is impossible for him to raise funds to meet the interest, and his second state is worse than the first.

INCOME OF THE PEOPLE AND THE GOVERNMENT SHRUNK TWO THIRDS

The Government of the United States today is facing the fact that the annual income of all the people amounts to not much more than $30,000,000,000, when the average annual income for the years from 1923 to 1929, inclusive, was 78½ billion dollars. In other words, the shrinkage in the income of the people, as well as the shrinkage in the income of the Government, is about 66⅔ percent, or about $47,000,000,000 per annum. The shrinkage in the market value of all property is almost as much and the Government Budget has likewise become two thirds out of balance because of the loss of the incomes of the people.

Unemployment has resulted and every evil to society caused by unemployment is now upon us.

ONLY ONE PROBLEM TO BE MET—DEBT

One thing, and one thing only, must be dealt with and remedied in order to relieve our people of the deplorable condition in which they find themselves. Debt is the millstone about the neck of the Government. The increased burden of interest that is piling up on the taxpayers of the Nation. Debt likewise is weighing down every State, county, city, and district government; debt is the impassable barrier that is stopping the progress of the farm owners; those in cities and towns who have the small home as well as those who own more expensive homes. It is the burden being borne by every person and organization which has "promised to pay."

A PEOPLE OVERWHELMED WITH DEBT IS A PEOPLE IN SLAVERY

Any Nation or people overwhelmed with debt is a Nation in bondage and slavery, and doomed to suffer want and privation until debt is wiped out or until the paying power of the people is reestablished to that point where payments can be made with ease and comfort to liquidate the debt obligation.

Debts are always created in the light of circumstances existing at the time the sale or contract is completed. The probable paying power is reckoned by the debtor who obligates himself to pay.

BUYING POWER OF THE PEOPLE IS THE ONLY THING THAT CAN HELP

The only thing that will permanently help this Nation is to revive the buying power and earning power of the people so as to enable them to escape the burdens of debt. There are not but two phases of the problem necessary to be considered; one side of it is debt, the other side is destitution because of it.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADVISERS

The President and his advisers—I am inclined to believe that it is more his advisers who have determined upon a course which I do not believe will ever bring our Nation back to that degree of independence and prosperity to which its natural resources and the integrity of its people, with their great learning and capabilities, entitle it to. We will revive, but in spite of the kind of laws proposed here today.

GOVERNMENT IS DEFLATING BY SELLING BONDS

Like the farmer who mortgaged his farm and imagined that he is making progress because he has some ready money raised through the mortgage, our policy is to sell billions and more billions of interest-bearing, tax-exempt United States mortgages, or Government bonds, which cover all of the future earnings of the people and all the properties of the Nation. This may be termed a policy of "inflation", but the reverse is true: it is deflation and a process of tightening credits. To illustrate: A bank is about to loan a business man $10,000 in order that he may speed up operations and enlarge his business; but the bank learns that the Government is to sell an issue of 4-percent bonds, and, since these are first mortgages on all of the property of the people and on all of the future incomes of the people, the banker decides that instead of making the loan to the business man he will buy Government bonds. He does so and transfers the credits, which belong to the depositors or the people dealing with the bank, to the United States in exchange for the bonds.

When the business man comes back to the banker to complete the loan he had asked for he is told that the bank thought it more safe to do so and had decided to purchase Government bonds with the $10,000. Therefore, could not make him the loan.

That procedure is going on all over the country, and the Government itself, instead of inflating the currency and bank credits, is contracting that credit and robbing business of the opportunity of securing the relief it must have if there is ever to be a revival of conditions in this country.

GOVERNMENT BONDS

Bonds, Government bonds, have these qualities. They are, first: a general debt or mortgage against all of the property of the Nation and the future incomes of its people, as these may be taken through the exercise of the taxing power; second, they bear interest and constantly add a burden to the taxpayers; third, they have no circulating or legal-tender privilege, but when once bought they "freeze" or retire from other use that much credit which might be had by business. These are the leading qualities of a national bonding debt, but there are other reasons incident to these that cause the banker-minded and selfish advisers, who almost always control the financial policies of every administration, to favor issuing bonds, regardless of whatever party is in power.

ADVANTAGES TO BANKERS IN ISSUING BONDS

Some of the advantages to the big banker in issuing Government bonds are these: They will certainly be repaid at maturity with accrued interest unless the Government fails, goes bankrupt, and ceases to exist; next, they are tax exempt and those who receive returns from Government bonds are not called upon to bear any part of the burden of Government.

Next, they are "liquid", and the more Government bonds we have in existence the more stable will be our banking set-up; because Government bonds can always be sold without very much risk of them depreciating in the market, since they are first mortgages on all of the people and all of the property of the Nation. Another advantage, they are payable in gold.

To sum it all up, a Government heavily bonded with a towering national debt is a Government sold to, owned, and controlled by the financial lords to which it has bowed for financial aid.

MONEY OR CURRENCY

I will call your attention to currency or money as a Government obligation first; it is a general debt against the people and obligates all of their property and the future incomes of the people are obligated to redeem money at its face value. Some have thought currency would and could be redeemed in gold, but informed persons never have believed this thing to be impossible, and recently, at a time when this country had more gold than any other country in the world and almost as much gold as it has ever had at any time, it failed to "redeem" the currency.

WEALTH OF THE NATION AND INCOMES OF THE PEOPLE IS ALL THAT MAKES BONDS OR MONEY VALUABLE

The wealth of the Nation and the income or earnings of the people, with the added intrinsic value of the trivial amounts of the gold and silver as commodities, is all that makes bonds of the Government good, and it is what makes the money of the Government good. Nothing else. The second quality of currency is that it is legal tender in payment of all debts. A third element, and one which is rebelled at by the financial lords, is that it does not bear interest.

BONDS AND MONEY

To restate: Bonds are a debt of the Nation bearing interest, do not have legal-tender or circulating privileges, and "freezes" the credits, cripples business. Money is a general debt of the Government, has circulating and legal-tender privileges, does not bear interest, and "frees" credit and business from the oppression of debt.

THE MEDIA OF EXCHANGE MACHINE

The media of exchange of this country is about $5,000,000-000 currency and $50,000,000,000 of bank credit. Forty-two billions of this belong to the depositors and eight billions to the banks. Bank credits are practically broken down at this time, because there is no purchasing power in the masses of the people. So when a bank make a loan on a house or a farm or something else, it cannot expect in the event the borrower does not repay to offer the house or farm or any other things securing a loan at a public sale and have some bidder buy in the property and return money to the bank for the loan made.

BREAKDOWN IN BANKS CAUSED BY LOSS OF BUYING POWER IN THE PEOPLE

The breakdown in our banking system as an agency to furnish credit or "check money" for business has come about directly because of the failure of the purchasing power of the people, which would make it safe for the bank to extend loans on property believing that it would be able to sell the pledge at public auction. This means that some person able and interested in buying the property in the event the borrower should default in paying his loan would be paid by the purchaser of the pledge. When the buying and paying power of the masses of the people is destroyed, the efficiency and use of the banking system is destroyed. Then all banks must arrive at that point where they are "unsound."

UNITED STATES BONDS ONLY DEPENDABLE LIQUID ASSETS

And there is no liquidity or dependable "liquid assets" obtainable by banks except United States Government bonds. That is one reason why the banker element of this country are crying out for a program to be put into operation by the President where more bonds and still more bonds be issued and sold to them by the Government.

PITTSBURGH BANK 98 PERCENT LIQUID

Recently I was in Pittsburgh, Pa., and was told that one bank there, owned and operated by one of the leading financial families of this country, had $150,000,000 of deposits and that it had on hand $138,000,000 of Government bonds, "first mortgages against all the people"; $5,000,000 in cash in its vaults; and some other millions of the best types of bond obligations to be had. So this bank had obligations to the amount of $150,000,000 due its depositors, and it held debts of the Government, money and bonds, to the amount of $143,000,000.

All banks could not do this, because there is not enough currency and not enough bonds. All the big banks are trying to shift onto Government bonds and obligations, while they pass the commercial paper and the undependable securities to the little banks. The big bankers then complain because the small banks fail as a result of having been worked into this undependable situation.

MONEY AND BANK CREDIT ONLY 30 PERCENT EFFICIENT

Bank credit and currency as a media of exchange are not now doing more than 30 percent of the work they did from 1920 to 1930. Bank credit is broken down, and the little amount of currency that is in existence has hidden out because the holders of it know that it is impossible for $5,000,000,000 of currency (not more than one half of this amount could be secured by the banks) to redeem and pay off $50,000,000,000 of bank deposits or bank debts promised by the bankers to the people.

QUIT SELLING BONDS AND PAY OUT SOME CASH

I come to the point I wish to present: It is absolutely impossible for this country to permanently reach a sound financial condition by continuing to sell its bonds. No nation can lend itself or its people out of debt. Such a course is deflation. It is a policy of contraction. Money must be used by the Government to pay current expenses, debts, or any other Government operation cost so as to place in the hands of business media of exchange. Three billion dollars would very probably be sufficient because, according to best authorities, a dollar placed in trade will do about 100 transactions a year. This would give an increase of some $30,000,000,000 in exchange power. This will also furnish a basis for a considerable increase as a base for bank credits, not as loans but as new deposits, and new money in the banks.

PRESIDENT SHOULD PUT NEW MONEY INTO BUSINESS

I repeat that it is absolutely imperative that the President, regardless of the selfish interests of the banker-minded element that surrounds him and his advisers, exercise some of the inflationary powers given him recently by the Congress and put into the field of commerce and business sufficient new currency to revive and restore the broken down media-of-exchange machine. Without doubt the public mind or mass psychology plays an important part on business. Before President Roosevelt came into power it had been heralded throughout the country that $2,000,000,000 of new money would be put into circulation. He told us in his inaugural address that the country should have sound but adequate currency.

INFLATION MUST COME

We have enacted another law which would authorize the President to displace $3,000,000,000 of Government bonds with a like amount of currency. The people became enthused over the prospects of a return of business because business and the price level are always exactly in proportion to the effective work of the media of exchange. So we began with the very beginning of the administration to go forward with accelerated speed, based solely on hope and enthusiasm.

WE HAVE GONE THUS FAR ON ENTHUSIASM

Enthusiasm has been the foundation for practically all of the recovery that business has experienced up to this time. The only way that we can tell when we have sufficient money, bank credits, and media of exchange available to business is by the commodity price level and the action of business. The action of business and the commodity price level can absolutely and certainly be controlled by our present Federal Reserve set-up, if it has unselfish, disinterested, conscientious and intelligent management by those administering it.

It can never work satisfactorily to the people when placed in the hands of individuals who are on the inside of manipulations, and who are hooked up with as well as servile to international banking institutions dominated by the Morgans, the Mitchells, the Normans, the Wiggins, the Baruchs, Mellons, Mills, Meyers, and the innumerable satellites that form this galaxy of financial operators who have preyed upon the people and wrecked the economics of the Nation.

NOT NECESSARY TO ABANDON THE CONSTITUTION

It is not necessary for this Congress to tear down the Constitution which has formed the foundation on which has been builded this great nation. It is not necessary for the Members of this House to abandon the pledge we took as representatives of the people "to support the Constitution of the United States." It is not necessary to commit innumerous infractions against all the teachings that we have reversed as being the bulwark of the liberty of the people by enacting legislation such as this bill to tear them down even temporarily. It is only necessary to drive out the money changers and take over the Government again for the people; restore the currency which it is the constitutional duty of the Congress to do, and thereby enable the people to reengage in business and labor so they may rise up from their condition of want, suffering, and beggary and again be restored a free American citizenship from a condition of mendicancy to which they have been subjected by the poor management of their affairs.

I say again, I still believe "that the powers not delegated by the Constitution to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." I still believe that when I took the oath of office as a Representative in Congress of the people of one of the districts of these United States, that that oath obligated me to "support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic", that I "bear true faith and allegiance to the same", and that I "well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter", meant something.

BILL H.R. 5755 NOT THE WORK OF THE PRESIDENT

I do not believe that the bill H.R. 5755, reported and considered by the House of Representatives, was the brain child of President Roosevelt. I do not believe its enactment into law and its execution as a statute would be for the best interest of the people of our country. It is filled with special privileges for the favored and wealthy interests, from that part which provides for the raising of $3,300,000,000 to the provision which levies an added income of 50 percent on the small taxpayer and no increase in income on the large taxpayer. The provisions of this bill, according to the Chairman of the Rules Committee, subjects us, to use his language, to a dictatorship. The Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has shown by the RECORD of May 25 that the chief witness sponsoring this bill was one Mr. Harriman, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Such influences should not prevail. I feel that I am best serving my country when I cast my vote against this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 8, after the word "State", insert "three quarters."

On page 17, line 11, after the first comma, insert "and one quarter in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of the United States according to the last decennial census."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and that for the purpose of submitting a question to the chairman of the committee. He and the members of the committee recognize the fact that I have been making a strenuous and honest effort to obtain an amendment that would clarify certain verbiage in sections 202 and 203. I had every assurance from the Rules Committee as well as from the Ways and Means Committee members that this would be done. And a short time ago I was informed by the chairman that the committee has been advised, and is of the opinion, that this amendment is not necessary and that the thing I am trying to accomplish by the amendment, to clarify and make positive that relief and aid for which I have contended, and for which the mayors of various cities appealed, is already included in the bill. The amendment reads as follows:

On page 13, line 25, after the figure "202", strike out the semicolon and insert a comma, and add the following: "such financing to be made by loans to, or the purchase of the bonds, tax-anticipation warrants, or securities of the State or political subdivision thereof which is to construct such project or projects."

Is that correct?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is what the drafting experts assure us. I brought the amendment of the gentleman to the attention of the committee. It was debated at length. We consulted with the drafting experts, and they assured us that it was already provided for in the bill and that it would be surplus if included again.

Mr. RAGON. I might say that that was the idea of not only the Senate experts, but also of the House experts. They contended that perhaps the gentleman's amendment might limit it, and that the way it is now, it is as broad as the universe, and that they thought the purpose of the gentleman would be accomplished more readily by leaving the bill as it is now, rather than putting in possibly a limitation.

Mr. SABATH. And for that reason you firmly believe the amendment is not necessary?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is true.

Mr. SABATH. I will take the gentleman's assurance and hope that the much-needed financial aid to the several municipalities will be not denied them, as it has up to this date.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment offered by the committee seriously affects more than two thirds of the States of the Union. It absolutely reorganizes their road appropriation and allocation from what it has been in the past, in 32 out of 48 States. It takes a large amount of money from 32 States and gives a great deal more to 16 other States. Under the law we have been operating under in building our roads since 1916 all road money from the Federal Bureau of Roads has been allocated one third on population, one third on area, and one third on road mileage. That present law is the same as in this bill, but since it was inserted in the bill the committee has had a change of heart, and now it offers an amendment which changes this rule, and provides that in the allocation of this $400,000,000 it will be allocated on the basis of one fourth to area, one fourth to mileage and one half to population. If this amendment is adopted here is what it will do. The following schedule shows substantially the amount each State will receive, also the amount each State will lose or gain by the adoption of this amendment:

State	Total	Amount gained	Amount lost
Arkansas	$7,765,000		$236,000
Alabama	8,553,000	$28,000
Arizona	4,757,000		1,102,000

Wyoming	4,037,800		1,100,000

[1] Practically even.

All the Western States except California will be wiped out as far as their progressive program is concerned. Roads in California will be of only local use if the States west of the Mississippi River are deprived of aid to build roads across the prairies and Rocky Mountains.

Mr. EATON. What about New Jersey?

Mr. FULLER. It profits to the extent of $2,000,000, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. What about Oregon?

Mr. FULLER. Oregon loses $892,000. Washington loses $328,000.

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. What about New Hampshire?

Mr. FULLER. New Hampshire loses $160,000.

Mr. LAMNECK. What about Ohio?

Mr. FULLER. Ohio gains.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What about Texas?

Mr. FULLER. Texas will lose $1,640,000.

Mr. FORD. What about California?

Mr. FULLER. California gains.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has not yet expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask it now.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HASTINGS. What about Oklahoma?

Mr. FULLER. Oklahoma loses to the extent of $456,000.

Mr. BOLAND. Is it not a fact that if this committee amendment is not adopted, that the State of Pennsylvania will lose over $3,000,000?

Mr. FULLER. Oh, no. The State would get the same proportion as it is getting now. It will profit under the proposed amendment approximately $2,000,000.

Mr. BOLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. FULLER. I know it will. I decline to yield further. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield to these gentlemen, but I cannot. These figures came from the Bureau of Public Roads, from Mr. McDonald, the Director. I am a member of the Committee on Roads and nine tenths of the Roads Committee are against the amendment. The chairman of the committee, Mr. ALMON, is here and wants an opportunity to speak against this amendment.

I doubt if a majority of the Ways and Means Committee, if they were all polled, would be in favor of this amendment. I know many of them are not, and will not support this measure today.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I cannot yield, on account of lack of time.

Here is the argument for this amendment, and it is not a just one: It is said there is more unemployment in the densely populated cities. That is true, but this is practically all the money that we people in the 36 States will get out of this $3,300,000,000 relief fund. The other $3,000,000,000 is going where it ought to go. It is going to the big cities of the Nation, to take care of those who are hungry and destitute.

They will obtain this money, according to the terms of the bill for Navy improvements, the building of hospitals, improvement of docks and harbors, building of ships, all as permanent improvements, and for like permanent improvements for the Army. They will receive more than any other portion of the United States and practically the greatest amount of the money that will be used for housing purposes. We are perfectly willing, and it is nothing more than right, that their destitute and needy should be taken care of; it is these densely populated localities that will receive the greatest portion, as they are today, under the $500,000,000 relief bill. It is not fair nor right to change the law in order to give more money out of this road fund to these localities. These 32 States that are suffering a loss need this money for road-building purposes and by reason of them having this portion they will put their unemployed to work and it will save a drain upon the $500,000,000 relief fund and loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Every State west of the Mississippi, with the exception of California, sustains a most material loss. The Republicans have always pursued the policy of making liberal appropriations to the Western States, on account of so much public lands, and their inability to build continental highways by local taxation. To adopt this amendment would mean that as soon as the Democrats got in power, as soon as the West sent their great number of Democratic Members here, it will be the policy of the Democratic Party to slap them in the face and to take away from them that which they have been receiving from Republican administrations.

The provisions of this allocation permits the Government to not only use this money upon Federal highway projects but to build and improve secondary and feeder roads. Therefore, this money would go into every community and would take care of the unemployed and we would be able to survive this panic with very little, if any, dole or charity from the relief funds. The great States of the North and East should realize that they cannot prosper unless the great agricultural South and Northwest prosper. If the 16 States that are to materially profit by reason of this amendment vote solely from a financial standpoint, and do not consider the rights of their sister States, then, of course, this amendment will be adopted in the House. We cannot believe, however, if adopted, that it will ever become the law. The committee has offered no argument nor any substantial reasons as to why the law should be amended. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I do not understand it so, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. Under the rules could the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] move to strike out the last words?

The CHAIRMAN. He could not.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. My contention is that the 5 minutes was not consumed in behalf of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] consumed 5 minutes in support of his amendment. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] consumed 5 minutes in opposition to the amendment. All time is exhausted.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I should like to inquire if I have any time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina consumed 5 minutes, most of which he yielded to his colleagues. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] consumed 5 minutes. Under the rules, all debate on this amendment is exhausted.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Are we to assume that the States not mentioned by the gentleman from Arkansas——

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not stating a parliamentary inquiry.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced he was in doubt.

Mr. GOSS, Mr. McCLINTIC, and Mr. BLANTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. FULLER to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 194 and noes 165.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON: Page 17, line 13, after the word "State", where it appears the second time, insert a comma and the words "and such funds may also be used in lieu of State funds to match unobligated balances of previous apportionments of regular Federal-aid appropriations."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON for the committee: Page 18, line 10, insert the following:

"(f) Whenever, in connection with the construction of any highway project under section 202 or 204 of this act, it is necessary to acquire rights of way over or through any property or tracts of land owned and controlled by the Government of the United States, it shall be the duty of the proper official of the Government of the United States having control of such property or tracts of land, with the approval of the President and the Attorney General of the United States, and without any expense whatsoever to the United States, to perform any acts and to execute any agreements necessary to grant the rights of way so required, but if at any time the land or the property, the subject of the agreement, shall cease to be used for the purposes of a highway, the title in and jurisdiction over the land or property shall automatically revert to the Government of the United States, and the agreement shall so provide."

Mr. KVALE. I rise in support of the committee amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] make a brief explanation of what this is?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The purpose of this amendment is to avoid the necessity of coming to Congress for authorization for permission where it is desired to construct a road or highway across a military reservation or property of the United States, provided the approval of the President and the Attorney General is secured.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Would that include War Department property?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Any property owned by the Government, I understand.

Mr. GOSS. I mean property of the Government under the control of the War Department.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I so understand.

Mr. GOSS. So that the bridge at The Dalles, Wash., permission to build which has been objected to when bills seeking this authority have come before the House, could be built under this provision?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is to avoid the necessity of coming to Congress for affirmative legislation to build a highway across or secure right of way across property of the United States, provided approval is obtained from the President and the Attorney General.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will listen for 1 minute to a two-sentence editorial, which appears in today's News. It reads as follows:

With the people indignantly demanding that the income tax be changed in such a way that the Morgans and their kind can no longer escape, some short-sighted Members of Congress ask, Why not substitute the sales tax for the income tax?

The answer is simple.

Morgan and his partners paid an income tax of about $11,000,000 for 1929. How much tax would they have paid under the sales tax method?

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not confining his remarks to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KVALE. I have read the editorial. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGHTON: Page 18, line 4, strike out the word "directly."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGON for the committee: Page 21, after line 25, insert a new subsection, as follows:

"(d) Effective as of January 1, 1933, sections 117, 23(i), 169, 187, and 205 of the Revenue Act of 1932 are repealed. In cases where the effect of this subsection is to require for a taxable year ending prior to June 30, 1933, the making of an income-tax return not otherwise required by law, the time for making the return and paying the tax shall be the same as if the return was for a fiscal year ending June 30, 1933."

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I think some explanation of this amendment should be made for the information of the House.

It is our purpose in this amendment to cure as much as we can the defects that have recently shown the country just how ineffective some of our tax laws are by permitting some of our great financiers to avoid taxes.

In 1921 we passed a law permitting individuals and corporations to carry their losses over 2 years. In 1932, last year's session, we cured that so as to provide no carry-over so far as the House is concerned, but the Senate wrote in a provision limiting the carry-over to 1 year.

Under the provisions of the amendment I have offered, the 2-year carry-over is cut out altogether and an individual may take his loss only in the year in which it occurred.

Now, may I speak frankly here? There has been a great deal of criticism, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota just a moment ago as to a certain investigation that is going on in the Senate now. I am frank to say to you that I doubt very much whether there was anything dishonest or in any way subject to criticism upon the part of the parties who were the beneficiaries of the escapement of the tax. It was due entirely to our tax provisions. For instance, if in 1932 a man made $5,000 which was subject to tax, he had the right to a credit on that of $10,000 he lost in 1929. If he lost an additional $5,000 in 1931, you can see he was excused from paying any taxes whatever, notwithstanding the fact he had made money in 1930 and 1931.

Our purpose is to make the individual take the credit for losses, which is right because they hit the big fellow and the little fellow alike, in the year in which they are sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. We cannot, of course, make this retroactive, the gentleman understands.

Mr. BRITTEN. That was not my idea. The gentleman stated a concrete case which was entirely correct, but I am thinking of the big manipulator who has a tremendous loss in depreciated stocks one year but only sells half of the stock one year and sells the other half in the succeeding year.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He does not get that loss if he does not sell it. It may depreciate in value but as long as he holds it he does not get any allowance for the loss in his income-tax return.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course, he does not, and that is how he is going to evade the law, even under this amendment,

Mr. RAGON. I may say to my friend that he has to sell it and take his loss, and he then takes his loss in the year in which the loss occurs. He is not allowed to spread it over a period of 2 years.

Mr. BRITTEN. But he does take the loss in the year in which he sells the stock.

Mr. RAGON. Yes; and he is entitled to that loss. I do not think we want to shut off a loss of that kind.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Has the committee considered a gross-earning tax to supplement the present income tax? There would be no chance to avoid a tax of that kind by anyone.

Mr. RAGON. That is a very pertinent question and some of us have had that very heavy on our minds and hearts, but in that event you are getting to the point where you would have to readjust all your present graduated income taxes.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. It looks as though we are going to have to do that anyway.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGON: Page 22, after line 14, insert a new subsection, as follows:

"No interest shall be assessed or collected in respect of any period prior to September 15, 1933, upon such portion of any amount determined as a deficiency in income taxes as is attributable solely to the amendments made to the Revenue Act of 1932 by this act."

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to carry out the purposes of the last amendment and is what might be called a "perfecting amendment" to the amendment which has just been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGON: Page 23, after line 9, insert a new subsection, as follows:

"(1) Effective as of the fifteenth day following the date of the enactment of this act, section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 616. Tax on electrical energy.

"'(a) There is hereby imposed upon electrical energy sold for domestic or commercial consumption and not for resale a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold, to be paid by the vendor under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe.

"'(b) The provisions of sections 619, 622, and 625 shall not be applicable with respect to the tax imposed by this section.

"'(c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon electrical energy sold to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.

"'(2) Despite the provisions of this subsection the tax imposed under section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 before its amendment by this subsection on electrical energy furnished before the 15th day following the date of the enactment of this act, shall be imposed, collected, and paid in the same manner and shall be subject to the same provisions of law (including penalties) as if this subsection had not been enacted.'"

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee automatically rises.

The Committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, and under House Resolution 160 he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Doughton amendment, on which there was a teller vote in the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The other amendments were adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 8, after the word "States", insert "three quarters."

On page 17, line 11, after the first comma, insert "and one quarter in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of the United States according to the last decennial census."

Mr. BLANTON. And on that amendment, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 222, nays 181, not voting 27, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am opposed to the bill in its present form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read the motion to recommit, as follows:

Mr. McCORMACK moves to recommit the bill (H.R. 5755) to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to strike out all of section 208, except subsections (f) and (g), and to report the bill back to the House with an amendment inserting in lieu of the portion stricken out a general manufacturers' excise tax of 2½ percent, from the scope of which all sales of food, clothing, and medicine shall be exempt. The said tax shall be in lieu also of the following manufacturers' excise taxes imposed by title IV of the Revenue Act of 1932: Tax on tires and inner tubes (sec. 602); tax on automobiles, trucks, and accessories (sec. 606); tax on radio receiving sets, etc. (sec. 607); and in lieu of the following miscellaneous taxes imposed by title V of the Revenue Act of 1932: Tax on checks, etc. (sec. 751); tax on use of boats (sec. 761); and to report the bill back forthwith with the following amendments:

Strike out all of section 208, except subsections (f) and (g), which shall become subsections (a) and (b), respectively; and insert the following new title following section 209 of the bill:

TITLE II

A. MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX

"SEC. 210. Imposition of tax.

"(a) There is hereby imposed a tax of 2½ percent of the sale price on the sale of every article sold in the United States by the manufacturer or producer thereof, if licensed or required to be licensed under this title, except in the case of—

"(1) sales by a licensed manufacturer to another licensed manufacturer of articles for further manufacture;

"(2) sales by a licensed manufacturer to a registered dealer of articles for further manufacture to be resold to a licensed manufacturer or to a registered dealer;

"(3) sales by a licensed manufacturer to any person of articles for further manufacture to be resold to a licensed manufacturer, but only if such articles are delivered by the first licensed manufacturer to the second licensed manufacturer;

"(4) sales for exportation;

"(5) sales to a State or political subdivision thereof, or any agency thereof, of articles for use solely in the exercise of a governmental function; and

"(6) sales of articles hereinafter specifically exempted and articles taxable under section 601 (c) (2) or (3) of the Revenue Act of 1932, relating to tax on brewer's wort, malt syrup, grape concentrate, and so forth, or section 617 of the Revenue Act of 1932, relating to tax on gasoline.

"(b) In addition to any other tax or duty imposed by law, there is hereby imposed a tax of 2½ percent ad valorem on every article imported into the United States, unless—

"(1) the consignee (within the meaning of the Tariff Act of 1930) is a licensed manufacturer (or his agent) and the article is an article for further manufacture;

"(2) the consignee (within the meaning of such act) is a registered dealer (or his agent) and the article is an article for further manufacture to be sold to a licensed manufacturer or to a registered dealer;

"(3) the article is imported by a State or political subdivision thereof, or any agency thereof, for use solely in the exercise of a governmental function; or

"(4) the article is specifically hereinafter exempted or is taxable under section 601 (c) (2) or (3) of the Revenue Act of 1932, relating to tax on brewer's wort, malt sirup, grape concentrate, etc., or section 617 of the Revenue Act of 1932, relating to tax on gasoline.

"(c) The tax imposed under subsection (b) shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930, and shall be treated for the purposes of all provisions of law relating to the customs revenue as a duty imposed by such act, except that—

"(1) the value on which such tax shall be based shall be the sum of the dutiable value (under sec. 503 of such act) of the article plus the duties, if any, imposed thereon under any provision of the customs laws;

"(2) for the purposes of section 489 of such act (relating to additional duties in certain cases of undervaluation) such tax shall not be considered an ad valorem rate of duty or a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value of the article; and for the purposes of section 336 of such act (the so-called 'flexible tariff provision') such tax shall not be considered a duty;

"(3) such tax shall not be imposed upon any article imported prior to the date on which this title takes effect;

"(4) no drawback of such tax shall be allowed under section 313 (a), (b), or (f) of the Tariff Act of 1930 or any provision of law allowing a drawback of customs duties on articles manufactured or produced with the use of duty-paid materials;

"(5) such tax shall be imposed in full, notwithstanding any provision of law or treaty granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States or of any country; and

"(6) when he deems such action to be in the interest of the revenue, the Secretary may direct that such tax with respect to any class of articles designated by him shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law as the tax imposed by subsection (a).

"(d) No tax shall be imposed under this title upon the sale or importation of the following articles:

"(1) Food for human or animal consumption (including those grades and forms of articles chiefly used as food for human or animal consumption in the form in which sold or after processing or as material for such food) and tea and coffee.

"(2) Medicines.

"(3) Wearing apparel for any part of the body.

"(4) Agricultural products.

"(5) Garden or field seeds.

"(6) Malt sirup, in containers of not less than 50 pounds each, to a baker for use in the making of bread.

"(7) Water not in closed containers.

"(8) Bibles, comprising the books of the Old or New Testament, or both.

"(9) Rosaries, chaplets, medals, and similar articles of religious devotion; hymn books, prayer books, and manuals of religious devotion.

"(10) Altars, pulpits, communion tables, baptismal fonts, and shrines; parts thereof; religious statuary and pictures; collection envelopes, plates, and baskets; cassocks, banners, and articles of regalia worn on the person or carried in the hand; tapers, lights, and candles; sanctuary oil; all the foregoing when manufactured exclusively for use in houses of worship.

"(11) Tobacco or tobacco products."

(e) Exemption under this section of sales or importations shall be allowed or granted only upon compliance with the regulations.

"SEC. 211. Tax on sales by registered dealers: (a) There is hereby imposed on the sale or other disposition by a registered dealer of any article sold to or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his registration, if not sold as an article for further manufacture to a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, a tax of 2½ percent of the price (subject to the provisions of section 212 (a)) at which such article was sold to such registered dealer, plus, in the case of an imported article, the amount of duties imposed thereon under any provision of the customs laws, if not included in such price. If the Commissioner determines that the records with respect to any article are inadequate, such article shall be held to be sold otherwise than as an article for further manufacture to a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer.

"(b) If the Commissioner determines that it is not necessary in the interests of the revenue to trace the identity of articles of any class in the hands of registered dealers, the regulations may provide a method of determining the proper tax liability of registered dealers with respect to articles of that class without regard to the identity of the individual articles.

"(c) Articles of such classes as the Commissioner may prescribe may (in accordance with the regulations) be sold to or imported by registered dealers free of tax when it is impracticable to determine whether or not they will be resold as articles for further manufacture to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers, and the tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed with respect to such articles if not so resold.

"SEC. 212. Sale price: (a) Generally.—In determining the sale price of an article there shall be included any charge for coverings and containers of whatever nature, and any charge incident to placing the article in condition packed ready for shipment, but there shall be excluded the amount of tax imposed by this title, whether or not stated as a separate charge. A transportation, delivery, insurance, installation, or other charge (not required by the foregoing sentence to be included) shall be excluded from the sale price only if the amount thereof is established to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in accordance with the regulations.

"(b) Sales on consignment.—In the case of an article sold on consignment, the sale price shall be the fair manufacturer's price for the article.

"(c) Retail sales by licensed manufacturer.—In the case of an article sold by the manufacturer or producer thereof at retail (or directly to the consumer or user), the tax shall (if based on the sale price) be imposed upon the price at which so sold, except that in the case of any such article ordinarily sold at wholesale (or directly to the consumer or user at prices varying with the quantity or character of use) by manufacturers or producers, the tax shall (if based on the sale price) be imposed upon the fair manufacturer's price for the article.

"(d) Installment sales: In the case of a contract for the sale by a licensed manufacturer of an article wherein it is provided that the sale price shall be paid to the manufacturer by installments, and the title to the article sold does not pass to the purchaser thereof until a future date notwithstanding partial payment by installments, or in the case of a conditional sale, each partial payment shall be regarded as a sale and there shall be imposed upon each payment that part of the tax which is proportionate to the part of the sale price represented by such payment.

"(e) Leases and royalties: If a licensed manufacturer leases an article or transfers the right of using the article but not the title thereto, or imposes a royalty on the use of an article, each payment with respect to the article shall be treated as a sale and the tax shall (if based on the sale price) be imposed upon the amount of such payment. Any such lease, transfer, or imposition of royalty on the use of any article by a registered dealer shall be treated as a sale.

"(f) Manufacture under contract: For the purposes of this title a person who manufactures or produces an article for another person who furnishes materials and retains title thereto, shall be regarded as the manufacturer or producer of the article, and the tax shall be imposed upon the first payment, or, if the tax is based on the sale price and there is more than one payment, the tax shall be imposed pro rata upon each payment; except that the person so furnishing materials shall be regarded as the manufacturer or producer of the article (1) if the article is to be resold by him and the effect of the application of this provision is to require him to be licensed under this title, or (2) if he is a licensed manufacturer.

"(g) Use or transfer of article in special cases: If a manufacturer or producer—

"(1) uses (including use as material in repair work), otherwise than as an article for further manufacture, an article manufactured or produced by him, or sold to or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his license;

"(2) transfers the title to an article by gift;

"(3) transfers the title to, or the right to use, an article to any person (otherwise than through an arm's-length transaction) at less than the fair market price;

such use or transfer shall be considered a sale for the purposes of this title, and the sale price shall be the fair manufacturer's price for such article, with allowance for any tax previously paid with respect to any materials used in manufacturing or producing the article.

"(h) For the purposes of this section the fair manufacturers' price for an article shall be a fair manufacturers' or producers' sale price for the article at the place of manufacture or production, as determined by the Commissioner, by reference to actual sales or to costs of manufacture or production, or otherwise.

"SEC. 213. Overpayments, credits, and refunds: (a) A credit against tax under this title, or a refund, may be allowed or made—

"(1) To a licensed manufacturer, in the amount of any tax under this title which has been paid with respect to an article for further manufacture purchased by him.

"(2) To a manufacturer or producer when he becomes licensed, in the amount of any tax paid under this title with respect to articles for further manufacture on hand when the license is granted.

"(3) To the exporter, in the case of an article sold for exportation or exported for sale, in the amount of any tax paid under this title with respect to the article.

"(4) To a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer who has paid tax under this title with respect to an article, when the sale price on which the tax was based is readjusted by reason of return or repossession of the article or a covering or container, or by a bona-fide discount, rebate, or allowance, in the amount of that part of the tax proportionate to the part of the sale price which is refunded or credited.

"(b) Credit or refund under subsection (a) shall be allowed or made only upon compliance with the regulations.

"(c) In no case shall interest be allowed with respect to any amount of tax under this title credited or refunded.

"(d) In no case shall both credit or refund under subsection (a) and remission or drawback under the customs laws of the tax imposed by this title be allowed on account of the exportation of an article.

"(e) No overpayment of tax under this title shall be credited or refunded (otherwise than under subsection (a)), in pursuance of a court decision or otherwise, unless the person who paid the tax establishes, in accordance with regulations, (1) that he has not included the tax in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed, or collected the amount of tax from the vendee, or (2) that he has repaid the amount of the tax to the ultimate purchaser of the article, or unless he files with the Commissioner written consent of such ultimate purchaser to the allowance of the credit or refund.

"SEC. 214. Licensed manufacturers and registered dealers: (a) Manufacturers and producers: Every manufacturer or producer (except as hereinafter provided) is hereby required to take out an annual license, in accordance with regulations, and shall pay a fee of $2 therefor. Licenses under this section shall expire upon June 30 of each year.

"(b) Exemptions: No license shall be required (but a license may be granted upon application) in the case of a manufacturer or producer (other than a manufacturer or producer of articles taxable under section 601 (c) (2) or (3) of the Revenue Act of 1932, relating to tax on brewer's wort, malt sirup, grape concentrate, etc.)—

"(1) if a farmer, with respect to his agricultural products; or

"(2) if for the preceding year the total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) manufactured or produced by him was less than $20,000; or

"(3) if, in the case of a manufacturer or producer not engaged in manufacture or production of articles (other than exempt articles) during the whole of the preceding year, such manufacturer or producer files with the Commissioner a statement under oath that to the best of his belief the probable total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) to be manufactured or produced by him during the year for which the exemption is claimed will be less than $20,000; but in the case of any manufacturer or producer exempted under clause (2) or (3) of this subsection, if the Commissioner determines, on the basis of sales for any period during the year for which the exemption was granted, that the probable total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) manufactured or produced by such manufacturer or producer during such year will not be less than $20,000, or if the total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) manufactured or produced and sold by such manufacturer or producer during such year reaches $20,000, such manufacturer or producer shall thereupon be required to be licensed.

"(c) Dealers and importers: A dealer in or importer of articles for further manufacture to be sold to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers may be granted an annual registration by the Commissioner, upon application in accordance with regulations and payment of a fee of $100. Registrations under this subsection shall expire upon June 30 of each year.

"(d) Revocation or cancelation of dealer's registration: If the Commissioner finds that a registered dealer has violated any provision of law applicable to the tax imposed by this title, he may revoke his registration. If the registration of any registered dealer is revoked, he shall not be entitled to registration within a period of 1 year after such revocation. The registration of any registered dealer may be canceled upon application by him.

"(e) Tax on revocation, cancelation, or expiration of registration: If a registered dealer's registration is revoked or canceled under subsection (d), or if a registered dealer's registration expires and is not renewed, he shall pay the tax imposed by this title (as if on a taxable sale at the time of revocation, cancelation, or expiration) on all articles purchased or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his registration and not resold by him prior to such revocation, cancelation, or expiration.

"(f) Tax on registered dealer on date title ceases to be in effect: Every dealer or importer registered on the day on which the tax imposed by this title ceases to be in effect shall pay the tax imposed by this title (as if on a taxable sale on such date) on all articles purchased or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his registration and not resold by him on or before such date.

"(g) Tax on expiration of manufacturer's or producer's license: If a manufacturer or producer ceases to be licensed before the date on which the tax imposed by this title ceases to be in effect, he shall pay the tax which would be imposed on a sale to him, as of the date on which he ceases to be licensed, of all articles purchased or imported by him free of tax by virtue of such license and not used as articles for further manufacture in the manufacture or production of articles on the sale of which tax has been imposed under this title prior to such date.

"SEC. 215. Returns, records, and payment and collection of tax:

"(a) Every licensed manufacturer or registered dealer and every person liable for any tax under this title (other than tax levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930) shall make monthly returns under oath and pay the tax to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall be made on or before the last day of each month for the preceding month, and shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the regulations prescribe.

"(b) The tax shall, without assessment by the Commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 percent a month from the time when the tax became due until paid.

"(c) Every licensed manufacturer and registered dealer, and every person liable for any tax imposed by this title (except tax levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930) shall keep such records, render under oath such statements, and comply with such regulations, as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may from time to time prescribe. Whenever in the judgment of the Commissioner necessary, he may require any person, by notice served upon him, to make a return, render under oath such statements, or keep such records as the Commissioner deems sufficient to show whether or not such person is liable for tax under this title (except tax levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930), and the amount of any such liability. All records required under authority of this section with respect to any sale shall be kept in such manner as to be readily accessible to the Commissioner or his agents for a period of 4 years from the last day of the month after the month in which such sale was made, unless the Commissioner authorizes the destruction of such records at an earlier date, or unless an agreement under section 611 determining the amount of liability under this title with respect to such sale is approved by the Secretary or Under Secretary.

"(d) In case any other person acquires from or against a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, by operation of law or as a result of any transaction not taxable under this title the right to sell any article, the sale of such article by such person shall be taxable as if made by such licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, and such person shall be liable for the tax.

"SEC. 216. Evasion of tax: (a) Diversion of articles sold for exportation—No article the sale of which has been exempted from tax under section 210 (a) (4) (relating to sales for exportation) shall thereafter be sold for use, or used, in the United States, unless the person so selling or using it pays the tax which would have been imposed on such sale if it had not been so exempted.

"(b) Tax on sales to or importations by licensed manufacturers or registered dealers: If the Commissioner finds that payment of tax under this title is being evaded or is likely to be evaded by a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, or a class of licensed manufacturers or registered dealers, he may require that the tax shall be imposed on the sale to, or the importation by, such licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, or class of licensed manufacturers or registered dealers, of any class of articles (even though articles for further manufacture or for resale to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers as articles for further manufacture). Credit or refund of tax so imposed may be allowed on proof by a licensed manufacturer that such articles have been used as articles for further manufacture in the manufacture or production of articles on the sale of which tax has been paid, or by a registered dealer that such articles have been resold to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers as articles for further manufacture.

"(c) Sale of article purchased as article for further manufacture: If a licensed manufacturer sells an article purchased or imported free of tax by virtue of his license he shall be liable for tax under this title in the same manner as if such article were an article manufactured or produced by him.

"SEC. 217. Tax on manufacturer or producer not licensed: Any manufacturer or producer not licensed or required to be licensed under this title, who sells an article and adds to the price any amount as tax under this title on such sale, shall be liable for tax under this title equal to such amount; and any such person who sells an article at a price represented to include tax under this title on such sale shall be liable for tax under this title on such sale.

"SEC. 218. Contracts for sale entered into—regulated rate: If any person (1) is subject to governmental regulation with respect to the sale price of an article with respect to which a tax is imposed under this title, or (2) has, prior to March 1, 1932, made a contract for the sale, on or after the effective date of this title, of an article, with respect to the sale of which a tax is imposed by this title, or with respect to which a tax is imposed by this section, and such contract does not permit the adding, to the amount to be paid thereunder, of the whole of such tax, and does not provide that the vendor shall pay such tax, then the vendee shall, in lieu of the vendor, pay so much of the tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price, or the price subject to regulation, as the case may be. If such a contract was made with the United States, no tax shall be imposed under this title.

"(b) The taxes payable by the vendee shall be paid to the vendor at the time the sale is consummated, and shall be collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section —. In case of failure or refusal by the vendee to pay such taxes to the vendor, the vendor shall report the facts to the Commissioner, who shall cause collection of such taxes to be made from the vendee.

"SEC. 219. Final agreements: The Commissioner (or any officer or employee of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, including the field service, authorized in writing by the Commissioner) is authorized to enter into an agreement in writing with any person relating to the liability of such person (or of the person for whom he acts) in respect of the tax imposed by this title (including the basis or method upon which such liability shall be determined or computed) for any period (past or future) specified in such agreement. If such agreement is approved by the Secretary or the Under Secretary, within such time as may be stated in such agreement, or later agreed to, such agreement shall be final and conclusive, and, except upon a showing of fraud or malfeasance, or misrepresentation of a material fact, (1) the case shall not be reopened as to the matter agreed upon, or the agreement modified, by any officer, employee, or agent of the United States, and (2) in any suit, action, or proceeding, such agreement or any determination, assessment, collection, payment, abatement, refund, or credit made in accordance therewith, shall not be annulled, modified, set aside, or disregarded; except that in its application to sales made after the date on which it is approved or agreed to, such agreement shall be held to be modified to the extent necessary to conform to any change in the law after such date.

"SEC. 220. Effect of changes in administrative decisions: No amendment or revocation of any regulation, ruling, or decision of the Commissioner or Secretary (or any official authorized in writing by either of them to make rulings or decisions which shall be subject to this section) in force at the time of the sale of an article, shall have the effect of increasing the liability under this title of any person with respect to such sale beyond his liability determined in accordance with such regulation, ruling, or decision in force at the time of such sale.

"SEC. 221. Applicability of administrative provisions: All provisions of law (except criminal penalties) applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926 shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with this act, be applicable in respect of the tax imposed by this title.

"SEC. 222. Penalties: Any person willfully violating any provision of this title or any provision of law in respect of the tax imposed by this title, shall (in lieu of any other criminal penalty provided for therein) be fined an amount equal to one half the amount of tax evaded or not paid or collected and accounted for (or if such amount cannot be determined to the satisfaction of the court, or if no tax was evaded or not paid or collected and accounted for, then not more than $1,000), or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, together with the costs of prosecution.

"SEC. 223. Exclusion of tax from gross income: If a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer includes in his gross income for income-tax purposes any portion of his gross receipts paid to the United States as tax under this title, he shall be allowed such amount as a deduction from gross income for income-tax purposes; but no deduction in respect of such tax shall be otherwise allowed under section 23 (c) or (d) of the Revenue Act of 1932 (income tax).

"SEC. 224. Regulations: The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe and publish such regulations as he may deem necessary for the enforcement of this title insofar as it relates to taxes on sales. The Secretary shall prescribe and publish such regulations as he may deem necessary for the enforcement of this title insofar as it relates to taxes which are to be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as duties imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930.

"SEC. 225. Definitions: When used in this title—

"(a) The term 'article' includes commodities of every description, including gases and electricity, and also including any commodity used for producing power, heat, or light; but does not include real property.

"(b) The term 'licensed manufacturer' means a manufacturer or producer licensed or required to be licensed under this title.

"(c) The term 'registered dealer' means a dealer or importer registered under this title.

"(d) The term 'manufacturer or producer' means any person (including a State, political subdivision thereof, or agency thereof) who manufactures or produces any article (but does not include the importer of an article), and includes a printer, publisher, lithographer, engraver, photographer, and producer of motion-picture films.

"(e) The term 'manufacture or produce' includes fabricate, cure, tan, dress, dye, bleach, blend, bottle, can, mix, spin, weave, refine, and process or manipulate in any manner, but does not include repair, nor the cleaning or ginning of cotton, nor the cleaning or threshing of grain, nor the preparation of beverages for consumption on the premises where prepared.

"(f) The term 'article for further manufacture' means only an article (1) which is to be used in, wrought into, attached to, or used as a covering or container for an article to be manufactured or produced for sale which will be subject to tax under this title, or (2) which is consumed in the process of manufacturing or producing such an article, but does not include plant equipment, machinery, or tools.

"(g) The term 'United States', when used in a geographical sense, includes only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

"(h) The terms, 'imported' and 'importation' mean, respectively, brought and bringing into the United States from any port or place outside thereof.

"(i) The terms 'exported' and 'exportation' mean, respectively, shipped and shipment to any port or place outside of the United States or laden and lading as bunker coal, other fuel supplies, ships' stores, sea stores, or legitimate equipment on vessels of war of any foreign nation, vessels employed in the fisheries or in the whaling business or actually engaged in foreign trade or trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, or between the United States and any of its possessions.

"(j) The term 'agricultural products' means agricultural (other than forestry) products in the broadest sense, not processed (further than by cleaning and ginning or cleaning and threshing) by any person other than the original producer thereof, or an association of such producers, organized and operated on a cooperative basis.

"(k) The term 'farmer' means a producer of agricultural products.

"(l) The term 'exempt article' means an article the sale or importation of which is, under section 210 (d), exempt from tax.

"(m) The term 'regulations' means regulations prescribed under this title by the Commissioner and approved by the Secretary.

"SEC. 226. Personnel: The Secretary is authorized to appoint, in the office of the Assistant Secretary in Charge of Fiscal Offices, two officers at salaries of $7,500 per annum, and in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, one deputy commissioner at a salary of $5,000 per annum, and, subject to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, such other officers and employees as are necessary to administer the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 227. Effective date—date of expiration: This title shall take effect on the 30th day after the date of its enactment, except that sections 214, 219, 224, 226, and this section, shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this act, and shall be in effect for a period of 2 years following such enactment, except that the provisions of section 208 shall apply to the taxes imposed under this title.

"SEC. 228. The taxes imposed by this title shall be in lieu of the taxes imposed by sections 602, 606, 607, 751, and 761 of the Revenue Act of 1932.

"SEC. 229. Short title: This title may be cited as the 'Manufacturers' Excise Tax Act of 1933.'"

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. Corning (for) with Mr. Wadsworth (against).
Mr. Bankhead (for) with Mr. Snell (against).
Mr. Randolph (for) with Mr. Griswold (against).
Mr. Pou (for) with Mr. Reid of Illinois (against).

Additional general pairs:

Mr. Disney with Mr. Dowell.
Mr. Montague with Mr. Simpson.
Mr. Fish with Mr. Perkins.
Mr. Kemp with Mr. Reed of New York.
Mr. Gillespie with Mr. Buckbee.
Mr. Hornor with Mr. Gifford.
Mr. Strong of Pennsylvania with Mr. Moynihan.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, being paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CORNING, I withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the subsection letters to correspond with the amended bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL—EXENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the title of this bill, "To encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works", sounds mighty well to those who are out of work and must have employment in order to feed themselves and their families, and it sounds well to all of us who have suffered and who are still suffering from this awful depression, which has depressed the minds and souls of men and has left in its wake failures, bankruptcies, bread lines, and suicides.

But high-sounding titles cannot stand up against cold-blooded facts and figures embodied in this act. The unemployment relief seems desirable, necessary, and almost imperative, but this could be accomplished without burdening the people with $3,300,000,000 more taxes and without destroying the antitrust laws enacted to prevent monopoly and to protect the weak against the strong, and without striking down our constitutional safeguards which have protected our people through a century and a half of progress and development, and built up the greatest and richest country in the world through individual effort and initiative, without dictation from the Government and without a dictator to control every effort and activity of the people from the cradle to the grave.

There is such a crying need for unemployment relief and such an imperative demand from all sources for assistance from the Government, that we are all in sympathy with these demands and the necessity of doing everything in our power to relieve the distress. The situation is so serious that we are scarcely able to think straight and to work out a safe and sensible plan to take care of the situation.

I would like to be able to follow the leaders of this House on this measure, and to follow the great humanitarian in the White House, but my knowledge of the principles upon which this Government is founded, and the results to follow from the flagrant violation of our organic law and the striking down the inalienable rights of the people to follow their chosen pursuits, secure in their independence and initiative to work out their own salvation without dictation from king, prince, or potentate, impels me to vote against this measure.

I cannot get my consent to confer upon the Federal Government the authority to go into the States and control wages and the hours of labor, the amount of products produced and every detail of private industry, including all rules and regulations under which every article of commerce is produced and priced. This is wrong in principle, even if it were authorized by the Constitution, and I do not think there is a Member of the House who will seriously contend that the Constitution authorizes such a law.

Congress enacted a law some years ago regulating child labor in the factories of the various States, and Senator Joseph Weldon Bailey, of Texas, father of Mr. BAILEY, now in the House, opposed the measure and stated that it was unconstitutional, and the Supreme Court promptly declared it unconstitutional. Persisting in its right to control labor in the States, Congress submitted an amendment to the States in 1924, authorizing the Congress to regulate child labor in the different States. This amendment has been pending for 9 years and has been ratified by 9 States. At this rate of ratification it will take 27 years longer to become a part of the Constitution. This Congress cannot afford to wait that long, so it is going ahead to regulate wages, hours of labor, and everything else connected with the business of this country, whether it is constitutional or not, under the cry of "emergency, general welfare, and imperative public necessity."

This bill proposes to issue interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds to the amount of $3,300,000,000, and to levy additional taxes upon the people to the amount of $220,000,000 annually to pay the interest on these bonds in order to put on a program of public works to relieve unemployment—and we all want to relieve unemployment, and start this country on the road to prosperity. This bill proposes to increase the gasoline tax from 1 cent per gallon to 1¾ cents per gallon. It proposes to raise the income tax on all incomes of $4,000 or less, from 4 to 6 percent, and on incomes up to $10,000 from 8 to 10 percent, an increase of 50 percent upon small incomes, thus placing the burden of taxation on those of small incomes, who are the backbone of business, industry, and agriculture and the mudsills of this Government, while the increase on higher incomes is insignificant.

The gasoline taxes are almost doubled. The States are now using this tax as almost the sole revenue to build and maintain public highways, which are an absolute necessity in this day of rapid transportation and communication for business purposes, and this tax levied by the States is as high as 8 cents per gallon in some States, which makes it almost prohibitive and lessens transportation. I submit that this field of taxation should be left entirely to the States, and I would repeal all Federal taxes on gasoline, if I could.

These additional taxes should not be levied upon the people at this time. No more interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds should be issued by the Government. The present Congress has provided through the farm-mortgage bill, the home-mortgage bill, Muscle Shoals, and emergency relief measures about $5,000,000,000 in bonds and the pending bill with $3,300,000,000 bond issue, will make our total bonded indebtedness approximately $28,000,000,000, almost as great as the peak of the indebtedness at the close of the World War, including the many billions loaned to foreign governments.

No government can borrow itself out of debt or create and maintain prosperity with a $28,000,000,000 debt hanging over it and an annual interest payment of approximately $1,120,000,000. It is too great a tax upon the annual productivity of the country. No country can carry such a load and remain prosperous.

This Congress has authorized the President to expand the currency by the free coinage of silver at a ratio to be fixed by himself, or by reducing the gold content of the dollar, not exceeding 50 percent, or by the issuance of currency to an amount of $3,000,000,000. He is authorized to use any or all of these methods to expand the currency and raise the commodity prices to a proper parity with the value of the dollar.

He has not exercised any of these powers, but commodity prices and stock-market prices have advanced in anticipation of the expansion of the currency, and when this anticipation becomes a reality, you will see prices of farm and factory products and wages advance to a point where agriculture, industry, governments, and people can survive.

Now, I propose to show how this employment and public-works plan can be financed and immediately relieve the unemployment situation without issuing interest-bearing bonds.

The President should exercise the authority already conferred upon him to issue $3,000,000,000 in Treasury notes or currency, exactly like the currency issued upon Government bonds deposited in the Treasury by the banks.

This money should bear no interest, but should be good for all debts, public and private. The courts have held that the debts can be paid in currency, as there is not enough gold to pay them.

It would be good money for the transaction of all current business and the payment of wages, and issued as needed to pay for public works, as now contemplated by this bill. It should be redeemable in lawful money at the option of the Government, 1 year after date. There would probably not be more than $1,000,000,000 issued and used in any one year, and redemption might never be necessary, and it would tend to raise wages and commodity prices gradually, and they must be raised to a higher level before general prosperity can be restored.

With a gradual improvement in all business lines, normal tax collections would be restored, and if prices and wages tended to increase too rapidly the Government could begin to redeem this money and withdraw it from circulation and there would be no need for issuing more money or continuing a big public-works program when business assumes normal proportions.

Understand that I would not redeem any of this money until farm prices and wages reach the average level between the years 1918 and 1928, a period when times were fairly good and people could pay debts and taxes with the products of the farm. Now, some of you call this fiat money, or printing-press money. All Government money is fiat, for without the stamp of the Government it cannot be used as a measure of value or a medium of exchange. I want to show you that this money issued in proper quantities is just as good and sound as the money issued on bonds. The silver in a dollar is worth in bullion value only about 30 cents, but it passes currently for 100 cents because it has the fiat of the Government on it.

This money would be backed by all the resources and taxing power of the Government just as the bonds are backed by the strength and resources of the Government, and there can be no difference in the value of this money and the value of the bonds, and both could be issued in such vast quantities as to impair their value, but nobody is proposing to issue money in such quantities as to impair its value or impair the credit of the Government.

It was asked some days ago in this House:

> If the Government can issue money, why could it not issue enough to pay all expenses of the Government and not tax the people?

That question was propounded by an able Member of this House, and he well knows that the Government could not issue enough currency to continue the payment of expenses of the Government for any considerable length of time without impairing the value and purchasing power of the dollar, and he knows, also, that the Government cannot continue to issue bonds in unlimited amounts without lowering the value of the bonds and impairing the credit of the Government. The Government bonds did fall below par during the war and immediately thereafter, and those of us who were not able to hold our bonds long enough to get face value were compelled to sell and take our losses.

There is a twofold reason for issuing Government currency to start these public works. First, it saves millions of dollars in interest; and, second, it puts the money immediately and directly into circulation without passing through banks with a "rake off", as is done when it is issued on Government bonds and cannot get into circulation until somebody borrows it and starts an industry of his own and pays it out for labor and the products of labor. This is a questionable and circuitous route, and we do not have time to wait for this process of evolution.

Nobody is advocating the issuance of currency in unlimited amounts and without control or redemption, and those who howl from the housetops about fiat money and printing-press money are not fooling the people but are playing into the hands of criminal corporations and financial highjackers, who have imposed burdens upon the people, robbed the Government of just taxes, destroyed confidence, brought honorable banking into disrepute, and wrecked our financial structure, and they should be scourged from the banking profession as Christ scourged the money changers and thieves from the temple.

Reverting to the regulation and control of industry, this is a double-barrel bill, containing at least two separate and distinct propositions—one controlling wages and the hours of labor in industry, including prices and the output of the products of the factories; the other a public-works program for unemployment relief, which appeals to everyone with humanitarian impulses, and which is necessary to prevent a further lengthening of the bread lines and a further continuation of public charity until business is sufficiently revived to absorb idle labor and start the country on the road to recovery. Those of us who are in sympathy with suffering humanity, and who are willing and anxious to do everything in our power that can be legally done to relieve the distress of the people, are greatly disappointed that these measures are combined in one bill to force us to swallow the unpleasant dose of surrendering the rights of the States to manage their own internal affairs and the rights of the citizens to manage their own private business without Government control or dictation in order to provide means of relieving unemployment and preventing actual suffering.

We are further disappointed that a rule has been adopted to prevent the offering of amendments to the bill unless they are offered by the committee. This prevents a Member from exercising his constitutional authority to assist in framing and passing desirable legislation. It is a dangerous policy and reverses the Democratic practice for a hundred years.

I am profoundly impressed with the present trend of events and greatly alarmed for the future at the present tendency to abandon the principles upon which our party was founded and to strike down all constitutional safeguards and launch the ship of state on an uncharted sea in a storm of passion and reckless action.

Times change and men change with them, but sound principles endure forever. We cannot at one fell stroke radically and recklessly change the whole plan and system of government which has made this the greatest and strongest Government in the world, without grave danger of destroying constitutional government and substituting in its stead a communistic government, with a sympathetic and humanitarian dictator in command, who may be substituted at any time with a Mussolini, a Hitler, or a Stalin, who might use these tremendous powers conferred by this bill in a manner not contemplated by its supporters, and to the great detriment and irreparable harm of the public.

Revolutions never go backward, and when we once abandon the principles upon which this Government was founded and guided to its present state of leader of the world, in education, finance, and civilization, there is no turning back but a constant command to go forward and grant more power to the Government to control every activity of the people; and initiative and individual effort, the pillars of the Government, will be weakened and finally destroyed and the Republic will be no more.

I invite your attention to a few paragraphs of the famous 15-minute inaugural address of the founder of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson:

> Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none.
>
> The support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies.
>
> A wise and frugal government which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvements, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned.
> Agriculture, manufacture, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise.

These maxims are very timely, and it seems that the great, constructive statesman was endowed with the gift of prophecy and could see through the mist of time and penned these immortal lines for this particular occasion.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, my vote will be cast for this bill because it is the President's measure, because it will employ several million men, it will start the wheels of industry turning, and finally it gives no choice of an alternative—it must be this bill or none at all; hence this bill is supported with some mental reservations. It is to be preferred a thousand times over a general sales tax.

In the first place, the gag rule that has been forced upon the Members of this House for the purpose of passing this bill without the dotting of an "i" or crossing the "t" is the most obnoxious of all gag rules that have been jammed down our throats. As in similar administration legislation, the flag has been waved and the party whip cracked with the old platitude "this is the President's bill, and unless you follow the President blindly you are unpatriotic, un-American, and only a pseudo-Democrat." This in the face of the fact that President Roosevelt, in his own humbleness and with his great breadth of mind, smilingly admits that he is not right all the time, that he does not expect "to make a hit every time he goes to bat." Moreover, I am one who declines to believe that the section of this bill authorizing additional taxation of the little fellow and allowing the ultra-rich to go practically scotfree, is any part of the President's program.

More than 300 Democrats sit on the floor of the House today. What reason is there to distrust these 300 Democrats? Particularly distrustful of the 115 new Democrats some appear to be. Why do they not trust these new Democrats? Is it because they are conservative; is it because they are reactionary? No. These cannot be the reasons, since the new Democrats were elected on a progressive, so-called "radical" platform, guaranteeing the people a new deal. These new Democrats may not have been here as long as some, but, on the other hand, their mentality is just as keen and sharp, and their hearts beat just as fully for the common people as any. Can it be that there is a fear of the liberal thoughts and liberal tendencies and the liberal desires to legislate for the good of all the people? Certainly not.

Offering my apologies for inserting personal allusions in this RECORD, I am constrained to state that 1,206,000 voters in the State of Ohio saw fit to send me here as their Representative at large. Not as a piece of driftwood did I float in on the flood tide of votes for the greatest man who ever sat in the Presidential chair, Franklin D. Roosevelt. In my humble judgment, these people voted for me because they believed in the principles which I enunciated, and they had confidence that I would fulfill the pledges made. Those pledges were:

First. Moratorium against foreclosure of real-estate mortgages.

Second. A $2,000,000,000 refinancing corporation for farmers.

Third. A $2,000,000,000 refinancing corporation for home owners.

Fourth. Enactment of the Frazier bill or some similar measure for the further refinancing of farms at 3 percent interest and amortization charges.

Fifth. Expansion of the national currency.

Sixth. Payment of the soldiers' bonus with new currency.

Seventh. No reduction in compensations or pensions for disabled war veterans.

Eighth. Remonetization of silver.

Ninth. Decentralization of wealth.

Tenth. Repeal of eighteenth amendment and modification of Volstead law.

Eleventh. Repeal of nuisance taxes.

Twelfth. Impose heavier income taxation in the higher brackets, heavier inheritance, gift, and estate taxes.

Thirteenth. Strengthen Sherman antitrust law.

Fourteenth. Bank-reform legislation.

Taking inventory at this time, I find that pledges nos. 2, 3, 5, 10, 14 have been fulfilled, thanks to the President having initated and Congress having enacted legislation covering these pledges. Unfortunately for thousands of farm and home owners, no action has been taken on no. 1, even though I have introduced three bills that provide for effectual and immediate suspension of all real-estate foreclosures in the United States because of delinquency in payment of interest, principal, or taxes.

A petition to relieve the committee of further consideration of the Frazier bill and bring it to the floor of the House for consideration initiated by Mr. LEMKE, has been signed by me.

When the independent offices appropriation bill was debated under the 5-minute rule on the floor of the House, I offered an amendment which, if adopted, would have meant payment of the soldiers' bonus within 1 year. I also signed the petition on the Speaker's desk to pay the bonus now with new currency.

I voted "no" on the so-called "Economy Act", which takes $375,000,000 away from disabled war veterans.

I am ready to support meritorious legislation for the remonetization of silver.

I shall introduce at an early date a bill to levy a capital tax upon all swollen fortunes.

The bill now under consideration, H.R. 5755, unfortunately does not repeal nuisance taxes, it reenacts them with an additional levy of three fourths of a cent on each gallon of gasoline.

To support this bill I must seemingly reverse my position on certain pledges, which are heretofore enumerated. However, I want to assure my many constituents that such a change of position does not necessarily mean that I am turning about-face on these campaign pledges. In fact, the reverse is quite the contrary. I will take them in their numerical order and find that only nos. 11, 12, and 13 are affected. Since we are voting for this bill under a gag rule which prohibits all amendments except those offered by the committee, it is an utter impossibility to repeal present nuisance taxes, as outlined in no. 11.

I would point out, however, that these taxes were not, nor are they now, a part of the Democratic platform or program. These taxes were enacted under a Republican administration. They are perhaps the least objectionable of all of this form of taxation, since in 95 percent of the cases the tax is paid to the Government by the manufacturer, processor, or producer and are not handed on to the consumer. As practical examples of this I would cite the tax on tires, rubber goods, toilet articles, jewelry, furs, automobiles, radios, electric refrigerators, sporting goods, candy, and soft drinks. Practically only one instance can be pointed out in this list where the tax is passed on directly to the consumer—automobiles. We are today purchasing all the rest of the majority of those commodities listed at lower prices than ever before in history, while the retail price of chewing gum and soft drinks remains the same as before the tax was levied.

We are correcting in this bill the atrocity that was perpetrated on consumers by the last Congress in the imposition of the iniquitous 3-percent levy on consumers' electrical energy. When we vote for this bill, we place this tax on the shoulders of those who should justly bear it—the Power Trust.

Some contend that the gasoline tax should not be made a part of the Federal Government's taxation program, that this is wholly a prerogative and function of the various States. I cannot agree with the proponents of such a course. The Federal Government is spending annually millions of dollars for the building of highways and in this very bill we are appropriating $400,000,000 for the financing of highways and kindred projects in the various States. Again, gasoline taxes in the past seem to have been absorbed almost entirely by the industry. In the State of Ohio we now pay 4 cents State tax and 1 cent a gallon Federal tax, yet the consumer is buying gasoline cheaper than at any time since the war. In my judgment, the three-fourth cent additional levy will be absorbed by the oil industry. Retail prices of gasoline will not mount and if so only very temporarily. Every owner of an automobile can see the tangible results of this tax in new and better roads, safer roads, wider roads, and in the widening and straightening out of narrow bridges, dangerous curves, and corners.

The acme of perfection in auto-vehicular transportation will not be reached, however, until the rubber-tired freight trains are taken off the public highways and either placed back on steel rails or compelled to build roadways of their own. It is not only the danger and destruction to roads that is costly, but the human danger to life and limb is far costlier. The increase provided in this bill on smaller incomes I am unalterably opposed to, particularly in view of the fact that the increase of incomes in the higher brackets is only slight, ranging from 3 percent to 5 percent. Were it within my power to legislate single-handed, I would make it so that on all incomes in excess of $100,000 per year, that 75 percent of that excess should go back to the Government which made it possible, eventually meaning a redistribution to the distressed from whence it came originally—from the toil, and sweat, and blood of the common people. In the case of the modern Captain Kidds and Sir Francis Drakes who boldly roam the high seas of international finance and banking, capturing small bankers, ruining investors and other worthy people, and then brazenly defying the Government by not paying income taxes at all, such as is now exhibited by the degrading spectacle of J. P. Morgan & Co. in the investigation in the United States Senate. I would not permit these plutocrats to escape scotfree as is now being done. I would make a graduated capital-tax levy and a graduated gross-income tax which would catch all of the multimillionaire crowd and force them to pay their just share of the cost of government.

The many technical provisions in our present income tax laws are bad. They favor the rich at the expense of the poor. That is no reason, however, why immediate steps should not be taken to block up the holes, to stop the leaks. If this were done, there would be little need for taxation such as we are imposing in this bill. We are taking such action in this bill.

There is outstanding today as obligations of the Government $13,000,000,000 and more of tax-exempt bonds. I would place a tax upon the incomes derived from these bonds. I would recall the war bonds and retire them with an issue of new currency and save the Federal Government $700,000,000 interest charges per year to the international bankers who pay no income taxes themselves.

There is, however, one outstanding good tax feature in this bill; that is the provision that subjects dividends to the normal rates of tax, which will bring into the Federal Treasury an estimated yearly income of $83,000,000.

When we vote for this bill we are voting for a reduction of our salaries, since the provisions of this bill practically double the income tax that Members of Congress pay. This should dispel effectively the propaganda disseminated by the plutocratic press that Members of Congress invariably vote against reductions in their own salaries. Personally, I am willing to make the sacrifice in the hope and belief that it will give jobs to thousands and thousands of our people who are now depending upon charity for the support of themselves and their families.

Another good feature of this bill is the statement of the President that when, and if, the eighteenth amendment is repealed, thereby providing sources of revenue running into many millions, forthwith these taxes which we are now enacting will also be repealed. The legalization of beer is a success, people are now buying beer legitimately and openly and for it the Federal Government is deriving needed revenue that formerly found its way into the slimy coffers of the highjackers, bootleggers, and rumrunners.

Now we come to no. 13. Upon first thought this bill seems to cast aside the Sherman antitrust law. I would point out to you, gentlemen, however, that this law has been practically nullified for the past 12 years. Never in the history of this or any other country have the trusts become so arrogant, have mergers been so prevalent, and monopoly so firmly entrenched as during the past 12 years. As evidence, I present the chain systems. Chain grocery stores, chain drug stores, chain hardware stores, chain clothing stores, chain dry-goods stores, chain gasoline and oil stations, and many others too numerous to mention. These hydraheaded monsters of monopoly pounce upon village, town, and city and rent the choice business locations. Independent merchants cannot compete with the chains because they do a credit business and have not the volume of buying or selling power. The chain outfits, however, located in New York and Chicago do a cash-and-carry business. Their volume of business is huge, they take all of the available cash out of each community once a week and deposit it in the vaults of Wall Street to further concentrate and centralize the swollen fortunes of the idle rich.

Monopolistic control and domination cannot get much worse than it is today. You cannot throw a man out of bed when he is already lying on the floor. So after a careful study and analysis of this section of the bill, my firm belief is that this measure in the hands of that great world's leader, a man of, by, and for all the people, Franklin D. Roosevelt, will be materially strengthened. Moreover, I think I can see an opportunity for the Government which now is a Government of the people, by, and for the people, to eventually own or control the big monopolies that today are festering sores in the tribute they levy upon the people. I refer to the railroads, the power trusts, the gasoline trusts, and other public-utility corporations. They, like vampire bats, suck the very lifeblood from the people's veins.

The American Federation of Labor supports this bill and many other labor organizations support it. The majority of clear-thinking people back home support it. I can see no good reason why I should not support it. This bill perhaps is the most important piece of legislation of the President's rehabilitation program. Upon him depends the success of this and all similar measures. The people believe in the President. He has not only won their admiration and their hearts, but their confidence as well. In him they trust, to them he appears as a Moses who will lead the country from darkness to light. This is his bill. I support it in the conviction that he will administer it honestly, fairly, and equitable.

Before concluding, a word about the man who I understand is to be appointed administrator of this far-reaching bill at this time is not amiss. I have known the gentleman, Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, since 1923. I met him at the national wheat convention held in Chicago in 1923. At that time the farmers of the Northwest were asking the President and Congress to fix the price of wheat at $1.75 per bushel. It was then that the agricultural debacle began. Gen. Hugh Johnson, with his bosom friend, the Honorable G. N. Peek, who is now administrator of the farm relief bill, were there fighting for the cause of the farmer.

These two gentlemen began their fight in 1921, and now their pioneer effort and trail-blazing have been successful after a 14-year-old fight and struggle. General Johnson, as so many of our illustrious men, is a product of the soil, having been born in Illinois and later moving with his parents to Oklahoma. He was the first cadet to be sent to West Point from that State. Upon graduation he was assigned to the Cavalry Service, and saw service on the border with General Pershing. When that great catastrophe and earthquake occurred in San Francisco, General Johnson was the gentleman assigned to take care of the relief and reconstruction work. He was a hero in the World War, and having been made a brigadier general at 42, later was assigned to the War Industrial Board as the representative from the Army.

On that Board he sat with his bosom friend and coworker, Hon. George N. Peek, who was in charge of the finished industrial products with the exception of war ammunitions. He has a brilliant intellect with remarkable executive ability and has always been known among his associates as an unusually efficient executive. Although an industrialist in 1921 engaged with Mr. Peek in manufacturing farming implements, General Johnson was one of the first in this country to see that the agricultural pauperism which started in that year was a cancerous growth in the Nation's economic progress, and that eventually that cancer would pull the whole Nation down with it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, we are here today enacting a measure that is just another expedient to bolster the deficiency caused by the failure of this Government to perform one of its functions to give this country a sound workable money system adequate to the needs of business and to insure the free play of the law of supply and demand by protecting new enterprise, new business organizations, and small competitors engaged in the service of supplying the needs of our people at competitive prices.

By the new and novel plan to be put in operation by this measure, this Government disregarding economic law is to sanction the price-fixing methods of the several groups of men and business organizations that have more responsibility than any other factor for the pitiful condition that the people of this country find themselves in today.

Mr. Speaker, the progress and development made in this country up to now can be traced and credited to the adherence to the policy of fair dealing, to the policy of permitting the free play of the law of supply and demand, safeguarded by regulations that insured fair competition and prohibited unfair trade practices designed to restrict trade.

Mr. Speaker, is there a man in this House who will say that our Government has been diligent in preventing price fixing and restraint of trade by unfair competition and unfair trade practices during preceding administrations? Why, Mr. Speaker, we are in a period when the stifling of new enterprise by the ruination and the destruction of small competitors has set at defiance economic laws that govern supply and demand.

The administrators of the Government have stood idly by and permitted the resources of the producers of this country to be drained to the point of exhaustion by the organized profiteering manufacturing interests of this country, and as a result the great majority of our people engaged in the basic industries, such as agriculture, lumbering, and mining, are in a state of financial ruin. These industries, the source of the natural wealth of this country, the foundation of our business structure, and the source of all material prosperity, unable longer to carry the load laid upon it by these profiteering monopolies, lie prostrate; and the monopolies themselves are involved in the ruin they have brought about.

My friends, to illustrate what has transpired in this country let me outline the conditions that have obtained in the business world in recent years. Gradually the prices of the controlled manufactured articles, necessities used in our basic industries, agriculture, lumbering, and mining and kindred producing industries have been raised and fixed at profiteering levels maintained by the ruthless destruction of competitors by any and every artifice that could be devised to crush and drive out of business new or small competitors, in many cases organizations comprised of enterprising young men who invested their money and gave their time and talent to supply the needs of these industries at a fair profit.

My friends, in passing across this country the abandoned small factory or plant, relics of these ruined business organizations, can be found in most every community, mute witnesses to the rapacious methods of monopolistic profiteering business organizations of this country. We are told that this policy of rule or ruin is the result of the operation of the old law of the survival of the fittest. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the Members of this House, Has their Government permitted the "survival of the fittest"?

What has been the result of permitting the draining of the financial resources of the millions engaged in our basic industries? What has been the result of piling up huge money surpluses by these profiteering business organizations?

My friends, the record of these operations and machinations comprises the blackets pages in our Nation's business history. Many of these profiteering organizations, with annual incomes almost as great as their total capitalization wrung from the producers of this country in order to palliate their injustices, were forced to the expediency of stock split-ups to spread the disbursement of their swollen profits resulting in stock market quotations which enticed the public into a frenzy of speculation and drove security prices to abnormal and unsafe levels. The banking interests of this country, realizing the danger menacing our business and financial structure, sought to check the speculative frenzy by the shifting of the supply of money being loaned to speculators by raising the discount rates. But the closing of this source of money supply proved ineffectual, and money continued to flow into the speculative market to the consternation of bankers and financiers, and the wild orgy of speculation continued out of bounds and out of reason.

Mystified financial writers called it "bootleg money", but at last the phenomenon was solved. It was money flowing from the huge surpluses of profiteering industrial organizations; money wrung from the producers of the country; money that should have remained in the hands of the people that produce the wealth of this country; money that would have been a bulwark of safety in times of business stagnation and credit contraction, now in the hands that despoiled the producer and wrecked the banking and business structure of this country.

My friends, we are on unsafe ground. We have been led into an unsafe banking and business system in this country. Other leaders have sounded a call to retreat, but let me warn you that safety does not lie in the direction we are attempting to follow in enacting this law. There is no safety in following a course that opposes the operation of economic law. We must strike from business the shackles forged by the ruinous monopolies. We cannot follow them into this maze of price control; to do so will bring disaster to our business, to our country, and to our people.

My friends, this speech is not a speech, but merely the printed extension of remarks made necessary by the denial of the right to address the House through a rule denying a representative of some hundred thousand people of the great State of Idaho the right to be heard on one of the most vital pieces of legislation that Congress has had under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, let me assure the men in control of the organization of this House that the people of this Nation are aroused and vigilant; that the issue of taxation without representation was settled on July 4, 1776, and our people declared anew their adherence to this principle of government on November 8, 1932.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill which pertain to the problems of industrial recovery are ingenious and I believe in every way admirable and workable. The creation of a Federal emergency administration of public works inaugurates a program which I should like to see elaborated and perfected into a permanent agency of our Government under a Cabinet officer to be known as "the Secretary of Public Works."

THE TAXATION FEATURE BAD

The part of the bill which presents the greatest difficulty is the program for raising the money. The bias brought about by long years of tinkering with our taxation laws or by ignorance of its fundamental principles seems to be insuperable, unconquerable, and unchangeable.

Notwithstanding our experience, as the result of raising the tax rates in the Revenue Act of 1932, we are asked to continue the nuisance taxes and the exorbitant tax rates which have so completely failed in raising the revenue anticipated.

FAILURE OF 1932 TAX INCREASES

Please consider these figures, which even those who run may read:

Income-tax receipts before and after

Receipts of fiscal year up to May 22, 1932	$889,494,988
Receipts of fiscal year up to May 22, 1933	595,805,396
Shortage	293,689,592

Representing the failure of the act of 1932 to bring results.

With this example before us, we are asked to deliberately embark on a program planned to further increase the burdens on the income-tax payers, utterly oblivious, apparently, of the inevitable and invariable law of "diminishing returns."

NEW RATES ON SMALLER INCOMES ABSURD

Increasing the income tax 50 percent on incomes under $4,000 per annum from 4 percent to 6 percent is absurd. The Treasury returns show that such incomes in 1930 yielded only $6,962,164, as against $465,445,657 from incomes over $4,000 per annum. But inequitable as it is, the increase will prove futile; for under the deductions and exemptions, which still remain in the law, few will pay any tax whatever and there can be no possible material increase in the yield.

THE NUISANCE TAXES CONTINUED

The increase of three fourths of a cent on gasoline is equally unwarranted. Added to the present tax of 1 cent a gallon, it is tantamount to a sales tax of 1¾ cents, which, estimating the sales price at 10 cents a gallon, is tantamount to a sales tax of 17½ percent plumped right on the backs of the consumers.

Three-cent postage means an increase of 50 percent. The taxes on telegrams and amusements are equivalent to a 10-percent tax on customers, yet the committee balked at a sales tax! What else are all these nuisance taxes if not sales taxes?

OUR TAX SYSTEM INVITES EVASIONS

While instituting these ruinous rates not a move has been made to simplify the income tax law and wipe out the complicated brackets and deductions which have made our entire income-tax system an ignominious failure.

Our income-tax system seems to me to have been deliberately planned to invite evasions and enable wealthy corporations and individuals to escape their just share of the tax burdens of their country.

There is much agitation at this moment over the revelations before the Senate committee which disclose the utterly unexpected denouement that one of the wealthiest men in the world paid not a single cent of income tax for the years 1931 and 1932.

Well, we can spare ourselves the torture of worrying about it when we recognize the fact that "it was all according to law" and that we ourselves are responsible for the foolish and iniquitous provisions which permit such outrageous evasions. We must remember, too, that the gentleman we all have in mind was not alone in the role of a "tax-free favorite" of a stupid law.

1,429,877 TAX-FREE INDIVIDUALS

Yes, there were 1,429,877 individuals whose returns in 1931 showed no net income and thus escaped taxation. Yet their gross income was disclosed by their filed statements to have amounted to $21,665,505,860. Think of it! Is this not a stupendous amount to be thus permitted to escape taxation? Yet, that is nothing to the evasions permitted to corporations.

231,287 TAX-FREE CORPORATIONS

Please look at these figures given me by Commissioner David Burnet in a letter dated May 25, 1932.

TABLE A.—Corporation income-tax returns for 1930 filed to Aug. 31, 1931

	Total	Corporations reporting net income	Corporations reporting no net income
Number of returns	445,699	214,412	231,287
Gross sales	$102,300,000,000	$66,500,000,000	$35,800,000,000
Miscellaneous income	17,950,000,000	12,650,000,000	5,300,000,000
Aggregate of gross sales and miscellaneous income	120,250,000,000	79,150,000,000	41,100,000,000
Cost of goods sold	78,200,000,000	48,900,000,000	29,300,000,000
Miscellaneous deductions	40,623,000,000	24,623,000,000	16,000,000,000
Aggregate of cost of goods sold and miscellaneous deductions	118,823,000,000	73,523,000,000	45,300,000,000
Net income	5,627,000,000	5,627,000,000
Deficit	4,200,000,000		4,200,000,000
Income tax	618,000,000	618,000,000

NOTE.—Less than half of corporations filing returns showed net incomes and paid taxes. Also, that 231,287 corporations reporting no net incomes showed gross incomes aggregating $41,100,000. Cost of goods sold and "miscellaneous deductions" are the loopholes through which corporations as well as individuals escape taxation.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS

It is incumbent upon Congress to devise some method by which the loopholes for these evasions shall be effectually and permanently closed. Yet, strange to say, Congress has given no thought to the matter up to the present moment. Instead of experimenting with futile higher tax rates and imposing nuisance taxes on the consumer, the first thing that ought to be done is to wipe out from our income tax laws the complicated brackets and absurd deduction allowances.

DEDUCTIONS FOR LOSSES IN STOCK SPECULATION

One of the most unwarranted of these deductions is that for losses in stock speculation, because, first of all, it is against public policy and encourages gambling—a vice which, when it reaches food and the necessaries of life, actually becomes a crime.

REMEDIES SUGGESTED

To get at the evasions by which tax returns are made showing no net incomes, various plans are in process of trial.

TAX ON GROSS INCOMES

Mississippi has put into operation a tax of 2 percent on gross incomes. It includes the incomes of professional men—lawyers, doctors, dentists, and so forth, and every trade or calling. No one escapes. All are called upon to bear their share without exception or qualification, starting with incomes of $1,500, if married, and $750 if single. The law was an instantaneous success. In the short time it has been in operation it has wiped out the State's deficit. I ask my colleagues to consult with the Representatives in Congress from Mississippi as to the success of this innovation. Collier's Magazine for November 19, 1932, gives a very interesting account of this mode of taxation, written by Walter Davenport.

OTHER STATES FOLLOWING

On May 1 of this year the "gross income tax law" passed by the Indiana State Legislature goes into effect. The only exemption is that the first $1,000 of income is not taxed.

THE NEW YORK METHOD

In New York the attack on fraudulent evasions is made in another way. By chapter 228 of the laws of 1933 the State legislature has abolished all of the deductions which in the past have opened the doors to fraud and misrepresentation in tax returns and has imposed in addition a flat emergency tax of 1 percent upon the net incomes of all who are required to file returns.

CONGRESS MUST ADOPT EITHER ONE OR THE OTHER METHOD

Congress must adopt either one or the other method. Personally I believe that the tax on gross incomes is the fairest, and I believe the plan I proposed in my resolution in 1932 (H.J.Res. 381) and on which I addressed the House on May 7 of last year, ought to be given serious consideration. I reintroduced it in amended form on May 19, 1933:

[House Joint Resolution 186, Seventy-third Congress, first session]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 19, 1933.

Mr. GRIFFIN introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Joint resolution to raise additional revenue by reinstating the income-tax rates for individuals and corporations in force prior to the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1932, and, in place of the increases provided by said Revenue Act of 1932, to provide a special income tax of 1 cent on each dollar of gross income for the calendar years of 1933, 1934, and 1935

Resolved, etc., That the income-tax rates for individuals and corporations in force prior to the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1932 (Public 154, 72d Cong.), approved June 6, 1932, namely, the rates as prescribed in Public Resolution No. 23, Seventy-first Congress, which was approved December 16, 1929, are hereby reinstated and restored and shall take effect as of January 1, 1933.

SEC. 2. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid by individuals and corporations, irrespective of and in addition to, the income tax they are subject to under the existing law, or any amendment thereof, a special tax of 1 cent on each dollar of gross income for the calendar years of 1933, 1934, and 1935.

SEC. 3. In computing the income tax on the income-tax return required, the taxpayer shall be permitted to include the gross income tax in the deductions allowed by law.

SEC. 4. This joint resolution shall take effect as of January 1, 1933.

The bill in its final form, it may be remarked, is changed to meet certain objections. As first introduced on May 7, 1932, it simply consisted of the first paragraph providing for the cent-a-dollar tax. This was before the passage of the Revenue Act of 1932, which so foolishly raised the income-tax rates—an increase which, as I have said, has increased the Nation's deficit by $293,000,000 in the 11 months of its operation. I had hoped it might have obviated the unnecessary raise in rates.

Section 2 of the bill, therefore, provides for a return to the income-tax rates of 1929, and section 3 meets the objections touching the charge of double taxation. I, therefore, provide that the gross income tax paid by the taxpayer may be included in the deductions allowed by law.

MY ARGUMENT FOR THE GROSS INCOME TAX (SPEECH OF MAY 7, 1932)

The basic idea of my plan is to put a 1-cent-per-dollar tax on the overhead, irrespective of the existing income tax law. Let them work out their manipulations in avoidance of taxation in their income-tax returns and take advantage of the exemptions and deductions allowed by the existing law, so long as we retain its stupidities, on the statute books.

But tell them, "On your gross income you will hereafter pay 1-cent-per-dollar tax on your receipts, in addition to the usual income tax." By that I mean the income taxes put into effect on January 1, 1929.

THIS IS PRACTICALLY A SALES TAX

In effect, it is manifest that this proposal is tantamount to a sales tax of 1 cent on the dollar; but it is one that is fundamentally just because it exempts no one whatever. It is a true sales tax, because it is computed at the source on the receipts from what is sold, and not on what is bought or consumed. To tax what the consumer has to buy is a consumption tax. It is a nuisance tax and a fraud on the consumer. It is a despicable fraud, because it taxes those whose necessities are greatest. It is unscientific because the tax is imposed not only on the original cost, but upon all intermediate profits—from the original down to the very last transaction. It taxes not only the employed, who have good wages with which to buy, but also those who are living from hand to mouth, thus making their poverty more difficult to bear.

A tax imposed on the product or thing is slapped squarely on the consumer. While if a very small tax is drawn out at the fountainheads, it etherealizes to nothing by the time it reaches the backs of the consumers.

BUT NOT A MANUFACTURERS' SALES TAX

While I say that the gross income tax here proposed is a sales tax in effect, it is not a manufacturers' sales tax, to which I am bitterly opposed. The objection to the manufacturers' sales tax is that it is aimed at a particular group. It is usually filled with exceptions. The moment the operation of a tax measure is directed against a specific group or groups it becomes unfair and ineffectual. It lessens the spread of taxation and thus increases the burden on those who are obliged to come under it.

OBJECTIONS MET

The gross income tax plan has encountered some objections:

First. From corporations. Their objections I answered in this way:

It is suggested that it is wrong to impose a tax on corporations, which "report" no net income under the income tax law. That, however, is not where the wrong is done. The real wrong is done to the taxpayers of the country in the loose provisions of the law which allow gross earnings to be frittered away by padded pay rolls, bonuses, exemptions, imaginary deterioration of plant, and technical losses, which enable them to escape taxation. It is, of course, true that these exemptions are intended to mitigate the drastic provisions of the income tax as applied to corporations. But it would be better to lessen the unreasonable exactions on corporate bodies than to continue rates which tempt them to exaggerate the exemptions to which they are reasonably entitled.

The fact is that the showing of no net income is a mere matter of bookkeeping. A corporation doing business, year in and year out, without showing an actual net profit is unthinkable. A corporation doing business without profit must necessarily eat into its capital and is, to that extent, perpetrating a fraud on its stockholders. The sooner such corporations wind up their affairs and go out of business the better it will be for themselves, their stockholders, their competitors, and the general public. They are a potential fraud on investors so long as they are encouraged to exist.

OBJECTION OF SMALL RETAILERS

It is represented that the margin of profit to small retailers is so small that it would be unfair to impose this tax on their gross incomes. In the first place, they would be entitled to the minimum deduction of $1,500 per annum at which the tax begins, because the bill does not propose to levy the tax on those whose income does not require them to make a return.

In the second place, this tax is universal and affects equally all who are obliged to make returns. Therefore, as it applies to all equally in every calling and in every line of business, it puts them all on the same basis in competition and gives no advantages to any.

HOW THE GROSS-INCOME TAX WORKS

Corporations: A corporation selling $1,000,000 worth of goods would pay a $10,000 tax. If the article they manufactured and sold was, for instance, frying pans, and they manufactured and sold 4,000,000 of them at 25 cents each, the tax on each frying pan would figure out about one fourth of 1 cent—too small to be shifted, pyramided, or otherwise burdensome to the consumer.

Individuals: With respect to individuals the Internal Revenue Bureau reveals that under the present law few, if any, married men drawing less than $4,000 a year pay any income tax whatever. First, they are allowed $3,500 exemption, and then $400 for each child. Under my bill a married man drawing $4,000 would pay $40 and would have the satisfaction of knowing that he was contributing something for the relief of his country in its present emergency. This, it seems to me, is a good deal better than standing a cut of several hundred dollars in his salary as the present indications point out is likely to happen.

THE TRUE BASIS OF TAXATION

The complicated methods of modern taxation are due to greed and selfishness of certain groups to evade and avoid their share of the Nation's burdens.

The direct tax is the simplest and most desirable. What the consumer pays goes direct into the Government Treasury, less the trifling cost of collection.

With indirect taxation the tendency is to pyramiding the cost, thus exacting more from the consumer than goes to the Government.

The way to meet our failures in taxation methods is not to increase the complexity of the structure by elaborate exceptions, purporting to be for the benefit of the under dog, but to recognize no class whatever, treating all equally.

OBJECTIONS TO PUNITIVE TAXES

Until some way is found to root out greed from the human heart, men will strive to accumulate wealth. The more you try to take away from them by taxation, the greater will be their effort to recoup such losses by gouging the consumers. Excessive taxation thus becomes a boomerang and hurts those it is intended to help.

There is no excuse for taxation except to run the Government. It is not the proper function of government to use taxation as an instrument to reform human nature.

EQUALITY IN TAXATION

The fundamental principle to be scrupulously followed is to avoid invidious class distinctions. No self-respecting American gives any thanks to legislators who try to curry favor with the masses by putting them in an exempt or special class. I believe every decent citizen would rather pay his tithe or ratio of the Government expense by a direct tax than to be robbed by the thousand and one methods of indirect taxation devised by unscrupulous demagogues.

EVERYONE SHOULD CHIP IN

From the figures furnished me by the Bureau of the Census on March 13 of this year, I find that there are in the United States 18,882,794 persons of all ages gainfully employed, and that their average annual earnings are "slightly less" than $1,518.

The following is the break-down:

Distribution, by class, number, and compensation, of those gainfully employed persons whose compensation was reported to the Bureau of the Census

[All figures in this table refer to the calendar year 1929 except those for electrical industries, which relate to 1927]

Class	Number	Compensation
Total	18,882,794	$28,657,490,000
Manufactures:
Salaried officers and employees	1,567,138	4,195,501,000
Wage earners (average for the year)	8,838,743	11,620,973,000
Mines and quarries:
Salaries officers and employees	52,633	137,639,000
Wage earners (average for the year)	806,418	1,091,990,000
Distribution:
Retail (full-time employees only)	3,833,581	5,189,670,000
Wholesale	1,605,042	3,010,130,000
Construction:
Salaried officers and employees	102,836	302,067,000
Wage earners	828,772	1,467,542,000
Hotels, total employees	291,259	257,034,000
Electrical industries, total employees [1]	956,372	1,384,944,000

[1] Central electric light and power stations, electric railways, telephones, and telegraphs.

Out of these 18,882,794 persons gainfully employed only 1,429,675 made income-tax returns in 1930. Less than a million made returns in 1932.

If all of these 18,882,794 persons who are gainfully employed at the present moment paid a tax of 1 cent a dollar, we would derive an income of at least $800,000,000, based on the relative returns of previous years.

A FIELD UNTOUCHED

According to the census of 1930 there were 36,994,695 persons, 25 years and over, gainfully employed. Yet in that year only 3,376,552 persons made income-tax returns, and of that number only 1,946,675 paid any tax whatever. Of course, the other 35,000,000 paid their share of taxation; but they paid it indirectly by having the tax burdens of others shifted over upon their backs, and, no doubt, in larger proportion than they should properly bear. By a proper system of taxation they would and should be relieved of the whole batch of nuisance taxes and the indirect taxes which are shifted over upon them. The gross income tax will do this. It will abolish all the nuisance and indirect taxes and let each individual bear his just pro rata of the Nation's burdens.

GENERAL SUMMARY

1. A tax on gross incomes is, as nearly as possible, painless taxation. It spreads the base and lightens the load for all.

2. It will make over 400,000 corporations pay taxes instead of 200,000. It will make millions of individuals contribute instead of only 1,900,000.

3. It will put the burden on those who have instead of upon those who have not.

4. It will impose the tax at the source so gently and equitably that it cannot be shifted, evaded, or pyramided.

5. It spreads a light tax equitably among many, making all citizens tax conscious.

6. It avoids evasions and puts an end to "No net-income returns."

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Speaker, although limitation of time for debate has made it impossible for me to express my views on the floor, I feel it to be due my colleagues and my constituents that my reasons for supporting this epoch-making legislation be outlined in the RECORD.

My vote was cast for the rule because of the practical impossibility otherwise to secure the enactment, without fatal emasculation, of the admirably conceived industrial-recovery plan of the President. For the same reason it will be cast for the bill on final passage regardless of the particular taxation rider it may contain to defray the cost of the program. I would prefer no bond issue, for I am opposed to further use of tax-exempt securities in Government financing. The already authorized currency, with its 4-percent annual retirement provision, could be used without danger to the Government's credit and would avoid the deflationary effect of a burdensome tax which will largely offset the benefits expected from the public-works expenditures.

But I shall not quarrel with the administration over the method of financing to the extent of opposing the essential stimulus for the reemployment of labor contained in the bill.

As to the sources of revenue that must be tapped under the President's plan, I also have my preferences; but I shall not carry these preferences to the extent of utter and irreconcilable opposition. I do not like business-throttling increased income taxes, nor gasoline taxes, nor the continuance of the existing nuisance taxes; and I do not like general sales taxes, even with food, clothing, and medicines exempted.

I introduced several weeks ago and called to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee members a bill to levy a tax on stock-exchange sales, and I am convinced that a levy of one half of 1 percent on the money value of such sales would provide sufficient revenue to finance the entire public-works project. With the business revival that will follow on the heels of the increased employment of labor, it could be painlessly collected, and at the same time it would operate as a most necessary curb upon the excessive speculation that may otherwise bring us again to the brink of an economic abyss. But whatever taxes the Congress may finally determine upon, regrettable as the necessity for their imposition may be, I indulge the hope and the confidence that that will be of short duration, because the imminent repeal of the eighteenth amendment will at once transfer the needed millions from the dirty coffers of the bootlegger and will remove this burden and other tremendous burdens from the bowed back of legitimate business.

The bugaboo of unconstitutionality, so legalistically and rhetorically held up before the committee on yesterday by the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], should not alarm. From the time of John Marshall no doubt has remained that our Constitution was operative as an expansible mantle of protection for popular government, and not as a strait-jacket. Rugged individualism has been swallowed up in the maw of mass productionism that has been encouraged by the policies of the last decade, resulting in socially destructive monopolistic development in spite of restrictive statutes. A certain measure of social control must be resorted to, else no hope remains for the existing system. It is exactly for the purpose of restoring the lost individualism of both employer and employee in industry, and to make conditions of fair, open, and honest competition again possible, that the paternalistic admonitions to be administered to industry under this bill are so vitally necessary at this time. When the drooping economic structure again holds up its head, there need be no public fear that a representative Congress will permit undue governmental control to continue.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, this panic was caused by a fall of values, the price level and the wage scale, brought about by the secret contraction of money and credits and resulting in a failure of earnings and income, destroying the buying and consuming power of the great masses of the people. A restoration of prosperity requires that the buying and consuming power of the great masses of consumers be first restored to them. And this can only be done by raising commodity values and the wage scale back to a higher level to be permanently stabilized there.

While this bill providing for an appropriation of over $3,000,000,000 will restore employment temporarily at a lower wage level and to certain laboring classes, it will not restore the buying and consuming power of the great masses of the people nor restore the same to the limited class permanently. Unless the relative value of money and commodity prices is changed, and which change can only be brought about by restoring the volume and supply of money in circulation, the prosperity stimulated will be temporary and will fall back as soon as the money provided is exhausted and the money expended will find its way back to certain banks to be hoarded.

It is true that this expenditure for highways and new buildings will not be wasted and will bring a partial recovery of consuming power to a part of the people temporarily and for a time.

And this appropriation of money could be justified if it were not for the increase of the already heavy tax burden upon the people. If this partial and temporary expedient must be resorted to, the present tax burden could be avoided and the same or better results accomplished otherwise. I voted consistently against the special rule brought out for the consideration of this bill to prevent all amendments in order to gain an opportunity to offer an amendment whereby the amount required could be raised by issuing non-interest-bearing currency notes to that amount. This would have avoided the heavy tax burden and the millions of interest which must be paid on the bonds to be issued.

As the rule has prevailed, and as I am not a member of this committee, I am now barred here from offering as an amendment the bill I have filed in the House today, H.R. 5800, as follows:

[H.R. 5800, Seventy-third Congress, first session]

A bill to restore and stabilize commodity values and the price level

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue United States notes in such amounts and at such times as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act. Such notes shall be issued pursuant to existing law, except that the limitation contained in section 6 of the act of June 20, 1874, on the amount of United States notes which may be outstanding shall not apply, and all the provisions of existing law shall apply to such notes when issued.

SEC. 2. United States notes issued under this act shall be used to—

(1) Take up and retire maturing bonds and similar obligations of the United States;

(2) Pay the current expenses and obligations of the Federal Government; and

(3) Carry out the program of public works authorized under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, and all public works authorized and which may hereafter be authorized as a measure or measures of relief.

SEC. 3. After the date of the enactment of this act, and until the index number of wholesale all-commodity prices as shown by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor is equal to index number of the wholesale all-commodity prices for the calendar year 1926 as so shown, no bonds or similar obligations of the United States shall be issued. Thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in such manner and at such times as will in his judgment best maintain and stabilize the wholesale price of commodities at the 1926 price level, issue bonds and similar obligations of the United States and retire and cancel or issue United States notes under this act.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

There has been no reason offered here showing why United States non-interest-bearing currency notes should not finance this program of works and construction. This currency has now been declared good and sound by both Houses of Congress and by the President, and the power to issue the same has been conferred upon the President. It would save the present tax burden and the people over $150,000,000 annually. It is opposed and prevented here by the money lenders, who demand this pound of flesh interest before the bill can be made a law. And they have educated the people using the words "fiat money" and "inflation" to make them believe in and demand interest-bearing bonds instead of non-interest-bearing currency. And this educated demand of the people is here reflected back upon their representatives to hold them in line and keep interest-bearing bonds in the bill.

There is a special reason why this amendment should have been offered and adopted to this bill at this time. We are suffering today not only from a failure and destruction of the buying and consuming power, but from a failure and destruction of the tax-paying power of the people, a failure of the ability of the people to pay taxes, high taxes, low taxes, or any taxes.

Following the close of the great World War, certain international financiers and bankers, to increase the value of their war-debt claims and bonds, organized a criminal conspiracy under a secret gentlemen's agreement. To carry out and complete this organized movement, a secret bankers' meeting was held May 18, 1920, in Washington, D.C., behind closed doors and curtains, and in the very shadows of this Capitol; and, in the name and style of "the orderly deflation committee of the American Bankers' Association", a secret resolution was passed calling upon the Federal Reserve Board to contract the volume and supply of money.

Following this secret bankers' meeting, the Federal Reserve banks, under order of the Federal Reserve Board, contracted and withdrew from circulation more than one half of the money and credits of the country. Following and under the laws of money, as money was contracted and withdrawn from circulation, the value of all money, money contracts, and the war-debt claims and bonds, held by these manipulating financiers and bankers, were doubled, tripled, and multiplied in value; and under the same economic and monetary laws, values, the price level, and the wage scale were forced down to ruinously low levels, which destroyed not only the buying and consuming power of the people but their taxpaying power as well.

Under this fall of values, the price level, and the wage scale, the people have been deprived of their means, earning and income, of their all with which to pay taxes. Their taxpaying power has been destroyed, has been withdrawn and taken from them. Under this failure of earnings and income, this destruction of the taxpaying power, the people cannot both pay taxes and live, and every impulse of nature and life, calls men to live before the payment of taxes. Their only means with which to live is their property, substance, and homes, and without which men are cast adrift upon the sea of uncertainty, facing want, suffering, and distress, not only themselves alone but those who by nature are dependent upon them for food, clothing, and shelter.

Under the natural impulse of men to live, the law of peace, order, and property must give way to the higher laws of life; and will give way to the higher laws of life when men are forced to choose between the law of peace, order, and government and the higher law of the right to live.

While the people are suffering today from a failure of the taxpaying power and the inability to pay taxes, even low taxes, we are taxing the people to loan money and finance the great banks of the country, solvent and insolvent. We are taxing the people to loan money and finance the railroads of the country without earnings or dividends with which to pay either interest or principle. We are taxing the people to loan money and finance the insurance companies of the country, some of which are paying their high officers more than $200,000 each as salaries. We are taxing the people to loan and finance the farm lenders and mortgagees to the amount of $3,000,000,000, under the name of farm relief, but for the benefit of the lenders.

We are taxing the people to make loans in millions to the several States of the Union to pay out as a dole or for works to furnish employment. And we are now proposing to tax the people to finance a $3,000,000,000 program for buildings we do not need and which we may never need, and many of which we should not build now, even if they were needed. We are still plunging headlong in a mad orgy of spending toward the shoals and breakers of national insolvency and bankruptcy and to pile still higher the burdens of crushing taxes as a choice of prosperity measures and over measures which call for no taxes and no interest charge to the people.

The tax charge upon the people has grown until today it is over $14,000,000,000 annually, or an average per-capita charge of $116. The total debt charge upon the people is $203,000,000,000, or an average debt charge of $4,300, with an annual interest charge of $115. The total tax and interest is over $22,000,000,000. The average per-capita tax and interest charge is over $200. This every man, woman, and child must pay before they can provide themselves with the necessaries and comforts to live.

This staggering tax and interest charge is paid by the great, common, laboring consuming classes. Sometimes the people, staggering under the burdens of taxation, in righteous wrath and indignation, demand a tax law requiring an equal tax payment from money, capital, and wealth, and enact their demand into law. Then if the statute runs the galling gauntlet of the shrewd and crafty and the ablest constitutional lawyers which money and high salaries can buy, and the tax is assessed and levied, the certain special few men upon whom the tax will fall, in control of industry and production, and the power to fix the price and control the supply and distribution of the necessaries, with the power of a king and the flourish of a despot they shift the tax back upon the people and levy and assess the same upon the necessaries and comforts to be collected from the helpless individual man, and they make the people pay their taxes.

I quote here from the Honorable Calvin Coolidge, late President of the United States, speaking upon another phase of taxation, but incidently observing as follows:

Taxing the rich to help the poor; the poor not helped but hurt. Taxes have to be collected by the rich before they are paid. They are collected from all the people. A higher tax means real wages are lower, the cost of living is higher, the chance to work is less, every home is burdened, the value is decreased, the quality of the food, clothing, and shelter of the children is reduced.

This statement of the great ex-President is true and strongly and explicitly stated. I only disagree with him in one particular—as to the remedy. Instead of exempting the rich because the rich shift the tax back upon the poor, instead of giving up the right to tax the rich and leave the poor to bear the burdens of unequal taxation, I would find some way, I would devise some means and method to tax the rich as well as the poor by taking control of industry away from the rich to protect the poor and make the rich pay their own taxes.

The economic or industrial power, the power to control business and industry, the power to control the supply and distribution of the vital necessaries of life, is a greater power than the taxing power, a greater or a rival power than of the power of the Government itself. While the power to control the price level, control supply and distribution of the vital necessaries of life remain in the control of any certain few men, there is no way provided under the taxing power to enforce an equalization of the burdens of taxation. There is no way to force the levy and collection of equal taxes from corporate wealth, from the certain special few.

But the labor and the consuming masses must not only pay the tax charge but must pay the interest charge upon the staggering, increasing total national debt. They must pay the interest charge upon the corporation debt of $76,000,000,000, all of which is reflected back upon the consuming masses. They must pay the interest charge upon the urban mortgage debt of $37,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon the bank loans of $35,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon State and county debts of $25,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon the national debt of over $20,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon the farm-mortgage debt of $9,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon life-insurance policy loans of $3,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge of retail installment loans of $3,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon usurious pawnbrokers' loans of $1,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon a total staggering debt of over $203,000,000,000. And now we are proposing to make them pay interest upon an additional loan of over $3,000,000,000 to stimulate temporary prosperity among a part of the people by spending.

The taxes for the payment of both interest and principal of this huge amount must be collected from the people and will be collected from the common consuming classes. Andrew Mellon, ex-Secretary of the Treasury and multimillionaire, has not paid his taxes. J. P. Morgan, world financier and banker and many times a billionaire, has not paid his taxes. Thousands of like bankers and manipulating financiers have not and will not pay their taxes. But we have collected from the soldiers by withholding from the pensions and disability allowances. We have collected from the wage earners and small-salaried men by taking the tax from their pay envelops. We are now to assess this tax against the small-income man, who is helpless and dependent, unable to employ crafty constitutional lawyers, has no standing in court, and will be compelled to pay promptly or suffer the penalty for default.

There is only one way to save and conserve the people's scant earnings and income, and their property, substance, and home, by which and in which to live—and that is to stop, reduce, and suspend the assessment and collection of taxes until their earnings and income are restored, until their ability to pay taxes and live—their taxpaying power—is restored, until their power to pay both taxes and live is returned and made secure to them. The assessment and collection of taxes must be stopped, reduced, or suspended. The costs and expenses of public affairs must be reduced to bare necessity, must be brought down to the common level with the ability of the people to pay.

This huge tax and interest burden should not be added and piled higher until there is a restoration of the tax- and interest-paying power of the people. There is only one way to meet the costs of this huge expenditure of money without intolerable burdens upon the people before there is a restoration of the taxpaying power. That way is by a resort to United States non-interest-bearing currency notes in place of the interest-bearing bonds and the present taxes to be imposed. If this administration program must be tested and tried out and experimented with on the theory that prosperity can be brought back by temporarily and artificially restoring the buying and consuming power of a comparatively limited number of people, the experiment ought to be made and the theory tested and tried out without imposing present taxes and without further increasing the burden of interest.

But as this building and works legislation has been determined upon by the administration as a part of the recovery program, and as the expenditure of this amount of money in the employment of labor and the purchase of material will restore the buying and consuming power of a part of the people and will indirectly stimulate the buying and consuming power of other people and will of itself bring partial and temporary relief, and in the hopes that the trial will hasten the currency expansion part of this program, I have determined to vote for the bill in its present form. While the provisions calling for taxation and the payment of interest on bonds is far from my choice, yet some action must be taken and this will be better than standing still in the midst of a great crisis.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I listened with profound interest to the able, philosophical discussion of title I of the Industrial Recovery Act by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and I agree with him that it presents a fundamental issue and marks a new departure in the direction of American Government; but I do not agree with the view that this measure creates the fundamental issue. It merely recognizes the existence of economic and industrial conditions creating the issue and seeks a way out.

If, as the gentleman exclaims, this legislation marks the end of individualism in America, it does not in itself kill individualism. In the language of the French, it merely recognizes a fact accomplished.

New and revolutionary methods in business, industry, and agriculture, which for convenience I may denominate the system and the machine, are constantly, increasingly, and permanently displacing the manpower of society, rendering it imperative that new methods be devised to make the manpower of society a charge upon the system and the machine, if our civilization is not to become chronically pauperized and our economic structure not to collapse.

This is no mere passing panic, out of which we may grope our way back into what we have known in the past as a condition of tolerable prosperity. This so-called "depression" is a permanent challenge to outworn relationships in the production and distribution of wealth and the answer must be a managed and regulated economic and industrial system if our institutions are to survive.

A door has closed behind us, never to reopen. The mind which conceived title I of this act—industrial recovery—had the power to analyze and appraise existing conditions and their causes and the vision to formulate a remedy. This title opens a new door through which, like it or not, the people of America must pass.

The worst thing that could come out of this depression would be that we could muddle through it and regain a state of so-called "prosperity", wretched enough in itself, without learning anything from it or modifying the agencies and practices which caused it. It is erroneous and inadequate to look upon the panic of 1929, and the speculative orgy which precipitated it, as the sole cause, or the main cause, of the present prostration of the economic life of the country. Long before the panic of 1929 agricultural commodities had fallen below the cost of production and agriculture was prostrate. Long before the panic of 1929 permanent unemployment in industry was increasing. Long before the panic of 1929, and underlying the so-called prosperity of stock and bond exploitation, the creeping paralysis of hard times was spreading over the land. These are facts. Even had there been no panic in 1929, we would be in the grip today of very hard times and industrial and agricultural prostration, and with millions of unemployed.

This crisis, which is world-wide, is most acute in the United States, because the United States, of all countries, has the most gigantic business systems, more gigantic machinery in operation, the greatest efficiency in production, the greatest perfection of methods and appliance for the elimination of hand toil.

The displacement of labor, both skilled and common, by the system and the machine is so obvious that it is known by the man in the street. It is less obvious, but none the less true, that the machine is putting the farmer out on the highway as rapidly as the laborer, that it is taking the bookkeeper from his stool, the clerk from behind his counter, and the telephone operator from her switchboard. The white collar is going into the discard along with the horny hand and the overalls. Indeed, it may be said that every day in every way the need for human labor is becoming less and less.

Recently I read a statement issued by Professor Prosser, of Minnesota, which I accept as true, and the statement was this: "The return of prosperity will not solve unemployment." In the article containing this statement, Professor Prosser gave some startling figures. He said that in 1899 four and one half million workers turned out products of the then market value of $11,000,000,000, and that in 1929, 30 years later, eight and one half million workers turned out products of the then market value of $68,000,000,000. In other words, less than twice as many workers turned out six times more products through improved methods of production—that is, through the machine. Professor Prosser calculated that by applying the machine methods of 1899 in 1929 it would have required 20,000,000 more workers.

He could have carried this survey on to the farm in the production of the great staple crops, with the same startling results. He could have shown 3 men harvesting a wheat crop in 1929, which required 30 men 30 years before.

He could have carried this survey into the banks, the business houses, the offices of the country, and shown the machine doing the work of the hand and the pen.

In a remarkable article published by Prof. Albert Einstein last summer, he enumerates the causes of the world depression, including overproduction, which he denies to exist with the possible exception of automobiles and wheat in the United States, the war debts, tariff walls, dumping by debtor nations on creditor nations, overspeculation, the loss of the Chinese and Russian markets, monetary inequalities; in fact, all the popularly attributed causes of the depression, and then states that the major cause is the machine. His remedies are community control of supply and demand, and shortening the working week to eliminate unemployment, and fixing the minimum wage so that the workers' buying power will correspond to production.

Wince as you will at the term, we must have a greater socialization of the production and distribution of wealth. We must regulate production, prices, hours, and wages. We must have a planned and managed economic system. Clarence Darrow comments pessimistically that the 30-hour week will not solve the problem, because the machine will soon overtake it. The answer is, it matters not how short the week must be. Society must ride the machine or be crushed by it.

This legislation is a recognition of this need and an experiment in methods to meet it. It will, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said, be permanent in its effects, even though the act be temporary. It is the result of no hysteria. It is a clear-sighted recognition of the break-down of the old order and the inescapable necessity of a planned and managed economic system, planned and managed for a more equitable distribution of service and wealth, which must be established if we are to avoid anarchy and revolution and a genuine dictatorship.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, there are many excellent features in this bill. Most important of all, it is intended to give employment to millions of our citizens throughout the Nation who are jobless.

I consider that paragraph 4 in section 205 is a just and wise provision, to wit: In the employment of labor in connection with any such project, preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents. I hope that this will result in all veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War receiving work at just and reasonable wages and that without delay. This is the least that we can do for the veterans after the injustices heaped upon them by the so-called "Economy Act", which I voted against, and which I trust will soon be repealed.

Much can be said against the taxing features of this measure, both the gasoline tax and the increased tax on small incomes. There may be some justification for the increased gasoline tax in view of the allocation of $400,000,000 carried in the bill for road construction, but I doubt it.

Instead of increasing the taxes on small incomes, we should increase the taxes in the higher brackets on the big incomes to make the rates conform to the British and French rates. We should increase our Federal estate or inheritance taxes on the estates of the millionaires. Great Britain realizes approximately one fifth of her total tax revenues from death duties, and our Federal and State Governments combined have raised less than one twentieth of their total taxes from this source. However, the bill is not subject to amendment, so we have to accept it as written by the Ways and Means Committee.

The bill provides funds for river and harbor improvements, a larger percentage of which are expended for labor than in the case of any other public works. Many of these meritorious improvements will be made in the State of Washington, and particularly in the southwestern portion thereof, and take up some of the slack in employment.

I voted against the McCormack motion to recommit and substitute a sales tax in keeping with my pre-election pledge to the people of my district that I am unalterably opposed to a sales tax, because it is a tax on consumption and falls proportionately most heavily on the masses. Let us rather tax the big fortunes and big estates of the millionaires and billionaires, and I venture the prediction that this will be done in the not distant future, perhaps when this very bill gets over to the Senate. I hope so.

This is the most important legislation proposed by President Roosevelt as a part of his great emergency relief program and is entitled to receive the hearty support of all those who love America and would again see our people employed, happy, and prosperous.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I said on yesterday in speaking against the rule on this bill I wish to state some of the evils in the bill to which I referred and on which I could not enlarge for lack of time. I favor the principle of the bill, and I feel that if the bill had not been forced on us under gag rule, which prohibits Members from offering amendments from the floor, we could have made of it a bill that would have been of great benefit.

ANTITRUST LAW

By this bill we abolish the antitrust law. It has been the only thing that ever protected the independent and small manufacturer and merchant. Congress abolished it years ago insofar as utilities are concerned, and because it did we produced Samuel Insull and high utility rates. Today we complain about the excessive light, power, and rail rates. We complain because Samuel Insull and his banker associates robbed the small investor. If Congress had not taken the utilities out from under the antitrust law we would have no complaints. By this bill Congress will take all out from under it and breed a million complaints from small investors. This bill will destroy competition and set the stamp of approval on monopolies while authorizing them to raise prices on every article the consumer uses. By this bill the Government becomes the partner of monopoly for private gain at public expense.

INCOME-TAX PROVISION

As the bill is I question whether or not the benefits to be derived will be in any way commensurate with the tax burden we are placing upon an already overtaxed people, and we are placing the burden of taxes on the laborer, the farmer, and the independent merchant, while leaving those of vast wealth, such as J. P. Morgan, free from taxes. It is appalling when we think that the combined income tax paid by the 20 members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. 3 years ago was only $48,000, and that during the past 2 years Mr. Morgan paid no taxes at all, although he was able to give to men in high position and political power stock subsidies of millions of dollars. He was also paying income tax in England last year and the year before, although he was not paying taxes in his own country. This bill should correct that evil and allow these men of great wealth to pay some of the cost of this public-works improvement.

THE RAILROAD-LOAN RACKET

The committee has inserted in title 2, section 203 of the bill this provision:

To aid in financing of such railroad maintenance and equipment as may be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I am opposed to a single dollar of this money raised by these taxes going to a railroad company under such a provision as this. The railroads have already borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $355,809,572.48, and they will never repay it. Every dollar of these loans was approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Why just last week the Washington papers contained a whole column on the fact that suit is being instituted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for $23,000,000, in which the Van Sweringen roads are in default on the theory that there was fraud in the obtaining of that loan. O. P. Van Sweringen was on the favored list of J. P. Morgan & Co. and received 2,500 shares of the Alleghany Corporation stock. He then used the money obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to buy Kansas City Terminal at twice its actual value from the Alleghany Corporation. Morgan and Van Sweringen both profited. Only the taxpayer lost. He lost to the extent of $23,000,000.

The railroads have never yet retired a bond except by issuing other bonds. We talk of high freight rates. Today freight rates are based so that the railroads may earn 6 percent on capital expenditures and every time you lend them a dollar and they expend that dollar, on that borrowed dollar of your money so expended for maintenance and equipment they have a right to increase freight rates to show an earning of 6 percent. They carry on their books today in their capital account hundreds of engines and thousands of cars that are obsolete and unfit for service and are on storage tracks. At the same time they carry on that account of capital expenditures the amounts expended to replace those cars, charging double on their books so that they may increase their freight rates.

THE RESULTS OF THE LAW

I should like to see a bill passed that would relieve our present economic condition but I do not believe that a bill that perpetrates such a fraud as this on the taxpayers of the country can relieve that condition. I am not talking against this bill and I am not talking against the principle of this bill insofar as it concerns restoring us economically. I am opposed to the evils in it and if the bill does not correct the evil of leaving a few thousand men of great wealth almost entirely free of taxes while placing the burden on the other 120,000,000 people of this country I shall oppose it. If it does not correct the evil of lending money to railroads to be used as a plaything of great bankers instead of using it for the benefit of the public I shall oppose it.

But for the gag rule, which I spoke against and voted against, we could have corrected these evils and conscientiously voted here for a good bill. I cannot conscientiously accept many bad things to get a little good when we could have so easily had a bill that was all good. Even at the expense of criticism I refuse to compromise with the tax-dodging firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. and to vote for a bill that increases the income tax in the lower brackets 300 percent and only increases it in the higher brackets 15 percent. Thousands of farmers in my district last year paid more taxes than J. P. Morgan with his millions.

DELEGATED POWERS

I have all the faith in the world in the President of the United States and his desire to do that which is right and proper, but that faith does not extend to some of his advisors. Under this bill he must delegate these duties to an administrator who will advise him as to these trade agreements and those administrators are not always wise. The fact that the men who handle these delegated powers are not always wise is best proven in the case of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs who advised the President regarding veterans' economies and who stands before the country now proven to have given false advice after the President put it in practice, and the President realizing the falsity of this advice and of the results of it is now changing those regulations, but he still has as his advisor the man who gave him erroneous advice and if his advice was erroneous once, it may be again, and we will have the same thing with any man to whom he delegates power. A man who is drunk with the lust of power that is given him disregards the rights of others, disregards the rules of common justice, and gives even the President who created his position, erroneous advice and allows the President to bear the odium as the result of that erroneous advice.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I am for this bill as a whole but am opposed to the taxation feature. The constructive portions of the bill are administration measures. The President is definitely sponsoring them. But he is not suggesting or advocating the taxation portion of the bill.

I very much object to the feature of the bill whereby the income taxes are greatly increased on the lower levels and almost untouched on the higher. I maintain that just the reverse is the equitable plan. And I condemn such a discrimination in favor of the rich.

Surely the place to go for tax money is where the money is. Certainly at this time of stress and strain we all feel that a redistribution of income in the United States is essential. And the place to begin is at the top. We all know that a too great concentration of wealth is the cause of our economic ills.

I hope that the time is coming, and that very soon, when no man in America will have an income of a million dollars a year.

Happily, the bill has the very sound provision subjecting dividends to the normal tax, that tends to increase the tax revenues derived from enormous incomes and to make the increase on such incomes comparable to that on small incomes.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Speaker, there are several reasons why I could not vote for the public works bill, H.R. 5755, which recently passed the House. In the first place, it was not the President's bill. In his address to the Congress on May 17 the President said:

Careful estimates indicate that at least $220,000,000 of additional revenue will be required to service the contemplated borrowings of the Government. This will of necessity involve some form or forms of new taxation. A number of suggestions have been made as to the nature of these taxes. I do not make a specific recommendation at this time, but I hope that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives will make a careful study of revenue plans and be prepared by the beginning of the coming week to propose the taxes which they judge to be best adapted to meet the present need and which will at the same time be least burdensome to our people. At the end of that time, if no decision has been reached or if the means proposed do not seem to be sufficiently adequate or certain, it is my intention to transmit to the Congress my own recommendations in the matter.

It is therefore clearly evident that the Ways and Means Committee adopted their own plan for raising the revenue rather than waiting for the President to transmit his own suggestions. I preferred to wait for the President's suggestion on this matter of raising the revenue.

There is no man who desires that employment shall be made possible for the millions of unemployed more than I do. I challenge any man on this proposition. For months my heart has gone out to those who have sought work but could not find it. I have done my best at all times for the unemployed of our Nation, both privately and officially.

The Federal Government already has outstanding bonds and debentures that must be paid by the taxpayers amounting to $20,000,000,000. The size of this debt on the American taxpayers can be better understood when compared as follows: There are less than 2,000,000,000 people in the entire world, to be exact, around one and three fourths billions. Another illustration will reveal the size of our present bonded indebtedness as follows: The $20,000,000,000 indebtedness is an outstanding tax obligation of approximately $200 for every living person in the United States. The size of a billion can also be better understood when we realize that it takes 1 man 4 years and 4 months, working 8 hours a day, 6 days in each week, counting $10 bills to count a billion dollars.

The rich people of this country have bought practically all these Federal Government bonds and all of them are tax-exempt securities, the interest and principal being guaranteed by the Federal Government. It has never been right for the Federal Government to flood the country with these tax-exempt securities, in which the rich invest their money, pay no taxes on them, and at the same time keep their money out of industrial and agricultural investment. The rich of the Nation will never place their money in public projects, in lands, buildings, and so forth, as long as this subsidy is given them by the Federal Government.

The public works bill provides for the issuing of $3,300,000,000 in Government bonds at 4-percent interest. This means, if the bill passes the Senate and becomes law, that these bonds will be bought by the Morgans, Mellons, Millses, and Meyerses, and others who have their millions. They will pay no taxes on their investments. They will clip their coupons, get their interest, grow fat on the poverty-stricken people who will sweat under all the new tax burdens included in this bill. This is unjust and unfair to the great middle class of people, who are paying 85 percent of the tax burdens already.

The Senate investigation of J. P. Morgan going on now here in the Capital shows that he and 19 other millionaires have made millions on stocks and bonds and that in 1929–30 and 1931 they paid scarcely any tax and in one or two years paid no tax at all. How in the face of all this can we continue to go ahead and allow the same thing to occur again?

The bill under consideration provides that the increase on income taxes shall be raised from 4 percent to 6 percent on incomes up to $4,000, and from 8 to 10 percent on incomes above $4,000. I am in favor of this increase on small incomes but why did not the committee allow the bill to be amended so that the rate could be increased more on large incomes? I want a larger increase on large incomes. Why did they refuse to raise the rate a great deal more on larger incomes? There are millions of salaries and incomes running up in the 25- and 50-thousand-dollar class and thousands of incomes running up in the 200- and 300-thousand-dollar class. I am in favor of increasing the rate on these larger incomes and salaries. The committee refused to permit amendments to the bill that would have corrected this situation. A man receiving an income of more than a half million dollars per year should be required to pay 75 percent or 100 percent of it to the Government.

Again, the bill provides an increase of three fourths of a cent tax on each gallon of gasoline sold to the consumer. It also extends all the nuisance taxes in the revenue bill of 1932. This would not have been necessary if the proper tax had been placed on large incomes. Many of the nuisance taxes in the Revenue Act of 1932 could have been discontinued had the proper income tax been placed on incomes in the higher brackets.

Another dangerous provision of the bill is that section 5 exempts from the provisions of the antitrust laws business operations carried on in compliance with a code, agreement, or license approved or issued under the bill. This modification of the antitrust laws means the end of all small business. The antitrust laws have been pigeonholed too long already and with this modification big business will have an open sway and it is only a question of how long will fish bait hold out, for the big fish will get the remaining few small fish. Mergers, combines, consolidations, encroachments, and monopolies have taken their toll and the small-town average business has been weakening for years, suffering from the strangle hold of big business.

Section 1 of this bill enables trades, industries, and business of similar relation to set up a code by which the related business may operate. It makes it impossible for small business to exist because big business will formulate and put into effect the trade code of competition, and so forth. It also makes the Federal Government a partner in every line and activity of business. Every form and kind of business will be licensed and regulated by a dictator in Washington. The President will select the best man possible, but even then it will be disastrous and destructive to individual business and enterprise. The Federal Government is already in too much business. What is greatly needed is more business in the Government and less Government in business.

Under the unlimited restrictions and provisions of the bill I would not be surprised if there is an alarm clock placed in Washington to call everybody in the mornings; a dinner bell by which all shall stop work and eat and perhaps instructions as to the kind and color of pajamas we should wear in winter and summer.

The unconstitutionality of the bill has been clearly and definitely shown by the two most distinguished constitutional lawyers of the House; Representatives BECK, of Pennsylvania, and COX, of Georgia. They have cited numerous cases where the Supreme Court has held that such a law was wholly unconstitutional because it interfered with State rights relating to interstate commerce. The barring from interstate commerce, goods that were manufactured under the provisions of the bill limiting the working hours to 30 per week, is an infringement on State rights as it involves the right of a State to regulate its own interstate commerce.

The bill provides that the hours of labor shall be limited to 5 days of 6 hours each, or not more than 30 hours per week. Proponents of the bill say this will be a blessing to labor. I am for better conditions for labor; better wages and better treatment, but this bill, in by judgment, will be destructive to labor in this way. Manufacturers will resort to labor-saving machinery more than heretofore in order to escape the provisions of this labor requirement. All the skill, money, and brains of the country will be mobilized in the future to further perfect and utilize labor-saving machinery, which, in turn, will destroy human labor. Labor-saving machinery has been used too much already. Millions of men are idle while one machine does the work formerly done by a hundred or more men.

There is another sound reason why I could not support this measure. Miss Frances Perkins, a member of the President's Cabinet and Secretary of Labor, recently issued a statement in New York entitled "The Barefoot South", in which she displayed her lack of knowledge of and sympathy for the South and its problems. She said:

> When you realize the whole South of this country is an untapped market for shoes, you realize we haven't yet reached the end of the social benefits and the social goods that may come from the further development of the mass-production system on a basis of consuming power in the South which will make possible the universal use of shoes in the South.

Since the labor provisions of this bill will largely be administered by and under the direction and supervision of the Department of Labor, I cannot see how the South can profit under such leadership as is in the Department of Labor. It is true that some of us in the South go barefooted and have large feet, but is due largely to our wonderful climate and southern freedom. It is also true that money moguls and money sharks from the honorable Secretary's own State and city have so manipulated the affairs of the Government for the past several years that they have bankrupted our fair Southland. A den of gamblers on Wall Street who never saw a stalk of cotton growing have robbed millions of children of bread and practically bankrupted the Nation.

I do not wish to be discourteous to the distinguished lady at the head of the Department of Labor, but I am convinced that if she administers the labor provisions of this bill in the same proportions as she has cast insinuations on the South and showed an utter lack of sympathy and knowledge of our problems, then God save the Nation!

Again, evidence has been clearly shown that the $3,300,000,000 will be gobbled up by a few of the moneyed centers of the country; that the agricultural sections will receive no benefits from its principal provisions. Here is one clear-cut proof: The committee, before the bill was passed, had a change of heart and submitted an amendment which took away from 32 of the States several millions of dollars of the allotted $400,000,000 for the road funds. Under the provisions of the amendment Georgia lost $260,000, or more than a quarter of a million dollars; Illinois gained $2,000,000; Massachusetts gained $2,000,000; New Jersey gained $1,908,000; Ohio gained $1,280,000; Pennsylvania gained $3,860,000; California practically a million; and New York gained $5,200,000. A few other States gained less than a million.

Members of the House from the 32 States that lost all voted against the amendment, or practically everyone did, yet Members from the other 16 large States were in the majority and outvoted us, carrying the amendment by a small majority. This was a concrete example that there was a determination on the part of the money centers of the Nation to fix the bill so that when it is administered they will get the cream and most of the milk, while the weaker and small States will get practically nothing. I could not vote for a bill that took $260,000 away from my taxpayers and dumped it in the laps of those States that happened to have larger populations. In government the weak and strong are supposed to fare justly and equitably under the law.

There is still another reason why I could not support this bill. The towns, cities, counties, and States of this country are already—most of them, at least—in debt and are bonded to the limit. How are they going to borrow all these billions from the Federal Government and give security? If they borrow it, they will have to increase their tax rates to pay it back with interest. In the first place, the Federal Government will issue bonds, sell them, and get the money. The people will be taxed to raise money to pay the interest and principal on the bonds. When the money has been raised by the Federal Government, then it will be loaned to cities, counties, and States. Those who need it worst cannot get it. If and when it is loaned, then the cities, counties, and States must assess taxes, increase the tax burden in order to raise the money to pay interest and principal to the Federal Government. This means higher taxes and more taxes for the average man, who is already paying the bills. Under present conditions this system of business and theory if put into practice will bankrupt the remaining weak structure of agriculture and business. The average American cannot stand any more taxes, the opinion of all proponents of the bill to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the unemployed millions must have work, and have it now. I realize this, and I learned years ago not to criticize anything unless I could offer something better in its place. Rather than increase these onerous and burdensome taxes contained in the Revenue Act of 1932 and continued here, with an increase in the tax on gasoline, I have repeatedly urged the following plan: Let the Congress enact legislation that will increase the income taxes on large incomes, using a graduated scale, so that the larger the income the larger the percent of income tax, until incomes of over a half million dollars—and there are plenty of incomes this large and larger in this country—then take the entire amount for tax and place in the Federal Treasury. No man has any right or business with such huge incomes. Again, let the Congress enact legislation that will increase the gift tax, the inheritance tax, and excess-profit tax. A graduated tax on these four items would place from four to seven billion dollars in the Treasury annually. Nuisance taxes on the middle class of people, who are now bearing practically all the load, could be repealed.

Here is the other suggestion I have contended for: Congress recently passed a bill, the farm bill, with an amendment called the "currency expansion" or "inflation amendment." It permits the President to authorize the issuance of $3,000,000,000 in new money. Why not issue this new money now and take it and put the unemployed to work? Why pass legislation of this kind and with this power if it is not going to be used? There would be no bonds issued and no interest to pay, and therefore no taxes to be increased, if this new money was printed and used. Repeatedly Members of Congress asked the question why this policy was not pursued, and so far I have failed to find anyone who can answer it. I am here and now declaring, in no uncertain terms, put the printing presses to running and issue this new money and relieve the unemployment situation without saddling any more taxes, debts, and bonds on the average man. There are billions of unpaid taxes now; how can the people pay additional onerous and burdensome taxes when it will take them 3 or 4 years to catch up on the past-due taxes?

Mr. Speaker, although there were 7 hours allowed for debate on this bill, H.R. 5755, and I made several requests for time, there were 50 or more Members who desired to speak on this bill but who could not get any time. I am not criticizing the committee. It is impossible for every Member to get the necessary time to address the House; however, I prepared this article for a 15-minute speech, and since I could not get the floor, I am placing it in the RECORD under the privilege granted for extension of remarks.

Dear reader, whether you agree with me or not, I am right in my contentions, and I reassert my determination to fight the money moguls who have bled white the great middle class of this country. They cannot continue to take their pound of flesh from the quivering bodies of innocent children and helpless widows and orphans, along with the burdened taxpayers of this Nation, without receiving my condemnation. I here and now turn my every ounce of energy and strength in the direction of fighting this crowd of money sharks, thieves, and rogues in a redoubled effort. They made their millions during and after the World War, when millionaires sprung up as fast as mushrooms, and so far as I am concerned, I will train my guns in the direction to force them to pay their share of the cost of government whether I am in Congress or out of Congress. I am fighting for a principle and not for popularity. I am concerned more for the manhood of our country than for the money of it, and am placing my patriotism first and not politics. I am fighting for a square deal as well as a new deal. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the taxpayers and the unemployed of the Nation to say whether or not I have offered the proper plans. It is true, I have constructively criticized the bill, but, in my humble judgment, I have offered a wiser, safer, and saner method for solving this stupendous unemployment problem than the plan incorporated in this bill.

It is not always popular to say the right thing, nor is it always right to say the popular thing, but whether popular or unpopular, and irrespective of who agrees or disagrees, my convictions are honest and my conscience is clear and I am confident that time will acclaim my statements as words of wisdom and warning.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, we are voting for or against a measure providing, as the title indicates, for industrial recovery. I support this measure. Three billion three hundred million dollars is to be provided for public works and economic recovery. This bill, after it has been enacted into law, will provide employment for 4,000,000 men.

Involuntary unemployment is a great moral wrong. It is wrong to deny to men and women the right to be gainfully employed. Our American civilization stands indicted because millions of worthy and industrious men and women are unemployed and children are underfed.

I served as a member of the Ohio Commission on Unemployment Insurance, under appointment by the Governor of Ohio. As a member of this commission, I spent considerable time attending hearings and in research work. I helped draft the measure providing for unemployment insurance that was introduced in the Ohio Senate early this year. We learned in our investigation that the unemployed, when their savings were gone, had but one recourse—charity. Men and women deserve the opportunity to be gainfully employed. We should provide work, not charity. Industrious men and women are entitled to economic security.

The enemy of the American people is unemployment, nakedness, hunger, cold, despair!

Our forefathers wished this to be a land of equal opportunity. They decreed, "All men are created free and equal." That was not so then. It is less so now. We should make those words the expression of a living truth. With the dark shadow of dire want, great suffering, and sharp tragedy on our land, we proclaim that our Government, which floated in time of war, for purposes of destruction, more than $21,000,000,000 of bonds, must take direct action now in a time of dire emergency, to relieve an unparalleled condition of unemployment and distress.

In addition to a vast public-works program, this measure provides generally for industrial control.

At the other end of the Capitol J. P. Morgan admitted on oath that he and other high officials of his company had paid no income taxes to our Government during the past 2 years. This is outrageous. Nothing has occurred recently to shake the confidence of our people in their institutions as the knowledge that J. P. Morgan and his partners, multimillionaires all, are escaping their share of the cost of government. Fortunately this bill provides that all net losses, including capital loss, shall be applied against income in the taxable year in which they occur. J. P. Morgan and other pirates of pillage and Wall Street profiteers will not in the future have the means to rent three floors of Washington's most exclusive hotel and maintain themselves as multimillionaires and at the same time evade payment of income taxes to their Government.

I regret that this measure, while it increases the income taxes of all individuals earning four to six thousand dollars a year and further reduces our salaries by doubling the income taxes Members of Congress must pay, does not greatly increase the income taxes of the man who receives fifty to one hundred thousand dollars and more each year. We should restore and increase surtaxes against great incomes. We would thereby take unjust tax burdens from the ordinary man. In addition to heavy taxes against large incomes, we should provide increased inheritance taxes against wealth possessed by those who did not earn it but were born to it. Call this "soaking the rich" if you like. The fact is there must be a better distribution of the wealth of this country in the interest of the common man—recently referred to as the "forgotten man." Concentration of great wealth in the hands of a few has made a mockery of our boasted democracy. It was a major cause of the depression.

I regret, also, that this bill provides for a temporary increase in the gasoline tax by three quarters of a cent. This is wrong. I fear that this tax will be passed on to the automobilist, and, in fact, that he will be compelled to pay 1 cent in addition for gasoline and the producer pocket the one quarter of a cent. Fortunately, however, by amendment, the Power Trust, the producer of electrical energy, is forced to bear the 3-percent tax instead of the consumer. This rights a wrong perpetrated by the last Congress. The motorist who is temporarily oppressed by this increased gasoline tax should know that $400,000,000 of the money raised by this bond issue will finance improved public highways, and he will be the beneficiary of that. President Roosevelt has declared that as soon as the prohibition amendment is repealed these new taxes made necessary to float a bond issue of $3,300,000,000 will be repealed. I have for years been advocating the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. We should have temperance instead of prohibition. The Government should profit instead of the racketeer—profiteer. We should put America to work. I am happy to predict that I regard repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment as certain within the next 8 months. This will give additional employment to many men and provide an electrical thrill and stimulus to some 60 allied industries.

The President has been a great leader in the movement to provide employment for unemployed men and women of this country and food for underfed children. This measure is, in fact, the keystone of President Roosevelt's entire reconstruction program. It will definitely put an end to this depression, which was originally avoidable, then terminable, but which had been, by the ineptitude of Mr. Hoover's administration and his failure to lead this great Nation in a crisis, permitted to become a national calamity.

The condition of distress and suffering has been without parallel in this country. The patience of men and women who walked city streets jobless has been remarkable. Millions of deserving men and women, the finest people in America, will not rid themselves of the chill and humiliation of this depression for a generation. We, by this measure, substitute work for charity. We are placing human rights above property rights. On public works a provision is made for 30 hours of labor a week, and preference is given, I am glad to say, to ex-service men with dependents.

Corporate dividends are taxed under the provisions of this bill. This is proper. I am glad that the former exemption has been repealed. This will add a substantial tax where it properly should go, upon the wealth of this country. Taxes should be based on ability to pay. This tax on corporate dividends will produce, it is estimated, $83,000,000 a year. The gasoline tax, which is a nuisance and to which I object, will bring in $92,000,000, and the income-tax increase, to which I object as it applies to the man receiving four to six thousand dollars, will bring in nearly $50,000,000 additional.

I voted against the rule prohibiting amendments to this bill. I had hoped to offer an amendment increasing the taxes against the higher brackets and decreasing the income taxes as applied to people of moderate means. I wanted to vote for the elimination of the increased gasoline tax. No amendments were permitted.

As to the sales tax my duty was clear. I voted against it. A sales tax is the most atrocious sort of tax. It bears down hardest on the poor. It was one of the causes of the French Revolution. I am happy that the Congress voted down this form of taxation by an overwhelming margin.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, a leading opponent of the sales tax, stated:

> This bill is so important to the economic welfare of this country that I would agree to any kind of a tax, including a sales tax, but give the people of this country this bill.

Thoughtful arguments have been made against the constitutionality of this measure. I have listened with great interest. Let me say that we should immediately enact this measure into law and then let the courts determine whether they are adhering to a Constitution flexible and suitable to the economic needs of 1933 or a Constitution of 1787, framed for a Nation of frontier farmers and hunters, with a few merchantmen in the seaports. If George Washington and Thomas Jefferson could arise from their graves, they would not know this country. We live in a different world, yet we are wearing the same political cloak made in 1787. At that time there was no machinery, no manufacturing to speak of, no railroads, no rapid transportation by air, sea, or land, no telegraph, no radio.

The makers of the Constitution legislated for 1787 and a decade or so thereafter. They legislated for 13 orphan States. They did not legislate for all time. The courts of our country have, from time to time, by their decisions, recognized the changes time has wrought. I hope that this emergency and the demands of the times will meet response in the minds of the courts of this land.

Business activity in the country is increasing. The questions heard everywhere are: Will it last? Are we really on the way? The answer, in my opinion, will be made by this Congress. Enactment of the industrial recovery bill will bring a new and better day to America. Let us not hesitate. Our duty is clear. We must not postpone the hope of our fellow men and women who are unemployed, nor continue the hunger of little children who are underfed.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I want to pay a tribute to President Franklin D. Roosevelt. He has already written his name high on the tablets of history as one of our greatest Presidents. If he never does another thing, that will be the verdict of posterity. Such being the high esteem in which America and the world hold him, after his brief introductory in the White House, what may we not expect from 4 years—or probably 8—of such constructive services as he has rendered since he became President less than 3 short months ago? He has charmed the whole world, and, I may say, he has almost taken away the breath of the nations by the swiftness and directness of his actions in meeting the economic crisis in America and in extending the principles of peace and humanity throughout the world. America has had a good many "live wire" Presidents, but never was there one in the White House who was more live, more inspired by a desire to do great and worthy things, or more consecrated to the service of humanity than the present occupant.

He is as human as Abraham Lincoln, and that is one reason why he is so universally beloved. In one of his recent radio addresses—all his radio addresses are admirable for simplicity of language and clear, cogent reasoning—he modestly disclaimed any of the attributes of a superman and admitted that he must inevitably make mistakes, citing Theodore Roosevelt as authority that if a President manages to be right 75 percent of the time, he ought to be satisfied.

My own impression as an observer and follower of Franklin D. Roosevelt is that he is right much oftener than 75 percent of the time. I think his "batting average" is almost 99 percent or, say, 95 percent, at least. As a believer in the rightfulness of his intentions and the soundness and efficacy of his proposals, it has been my privilege to support him consistently. I voted to give him the broadest powers to consolidate the Government and to eliminate waste and extravagance. I endorsed his handling of the banking situation, which, I think, was the cleverest piece of executive management I have ever known. I went with him through the Garden of Gethsemane when I voted for his economy bill. That bill almost rent my heart in two when I thought of the veterans and the Government employees who would be adversely affected by it; but because the President, speaking for the whole Nation, asked us to pass that bill to save America from financial collapse and anarchy, I unhesitatingly placed myself on his side, believing that an "aye" vote was best for all our people, veterans and nonveterans alike, and for the limitless procession of posterity. I echo a thought that is widely prevalent throughout the world today when I thank God for this splendid man and for the promise held forth in his "new deal." Millions upon millions of disconsolate and sorely laden human beings, groping along the dimly starlit paths that lead to nowhere, their hopes shattered and their spirits drenched with doubt and despair, are receiving the inspiration of renewed faith when they turn their eyes toward the present occupant of the White House at Washington. In the exuberance of their newfound confidence they hail him as deliverer. He is the rising sun, whose effulgence overflows the world.

Though I may not agree with him on every detail of his program, I am whole-heartedly with him in his main purpose. My reading of history teaches me that back of the shadows of every supreme crisis moves a ruling Providence and that in God's appointed time some great soul always emerges to save the situation, as Washington saved America by the sword and Jefferson saved for all posterity the inestimable franchise of freedom and as Lincoln saved the Union which the genius of Washington and Jefferson and their compatriots had welded into the most perfect form of government ever known to man. All the present signs and indications justify the belief that history is repeating itself and that providential vision has placed in the White House another great soul who is leading us out of the lowlands and on to the heights.

I verily believe that the President, by his matchless courage and sound proposals, in less than 3 months after taking the oath of office, already has whipped the depression in America. This is indicated by rising price levels, by orders for goods, by factory employees returning to the machine shops and forges, and even more by a tone of encouragement and cheer that is becoming manifest throughout the land.

Let us construe all of these harbingers favorably as they are entitled to be construed. Let us have faith in the future; and, having faith in the future, let us not jeopardize the victory already at hand by piling up a bond issue of $3,300,000,000 for public works which, while perhaps desirable, are not absolutely needed. The depression is whipped by that part of the President's wonderful program that already has been adopted, but it may not stay whipped if we pile up a vast additional bonded debt—almost as great a debt as was required to finance the entire Civil War—and by so doing not only fasten on the American people the largest national indebtedness in all our history but also an annual recurring interest charge of $220,000,000 which must be met by imposing additional taxes. We have all heard of the lawyer who, after winning his case, went ahead with another speech and lost it.

The President's program up to this hour has planted the seeds of recovery in this Republic. If Congress were to adjourn right now and nature were allowed to take her course, I believe the factories would begin to hum and the natural law which governs the necessities of men, the law of supply and demand, would begin to absorb the unemployed back into employment, and in reasonable time prosperity would come from her place of hiding "around the corner" and take her place in our midst, and there would be no need of an enormous public-works program at the expense of the taxpayers, because people would be employed in a normal way to meet normal demands.

It is as true now as it ever has been that we cannot spend ourselves into a condition of prosperity. To balance the Budget one day and then turn around and launch a program of expenditures vaster than ever was known to mortal man is to my mind economically unsound. It means that we are incurring another great tax burden which must be met by additional taxes, not only this year and next year but every year throughout the years to come, until the bonded debt is paid. I fear that increased taxes at this time would not only impose excessive burdens on a country already staggering under an enormous load of debt but they would further reduce the purchasing power of the masses, dry up the capital so much needed for productive enterprise, and so hamper industry and retard return of prosperity. My attitude toward this measure is consistent with the honest convictions of a lifetime.

I have always voted against bills such as this one, believing them to be economically unsound and ineffective as unemployment-relief measures. I opposed Speaker Garner's great billion-dollar public-building program in the Seventy-second Congress and I voted against it, although I had, and still have, a most affectionate regard for its author; and in the same Congress I opposed and voted against a bill appropriating $130,000,000 for hard-surfaced roads, which was brought forward as a bill to relieve unemployment. The vice of all such measures is that they do not relieve unemployment in any degree commensurate with the great fixed burden they fasten on the taxpayers. Contractors, machinery manufacturers, material men, various groups of middlemen get too much of the money that should go to relieve unemployment, and I am not going to vote one week for the drastic economy bill and the next week take the savings from the veterans and turn those savings over to middlemen who have less need of assistance than the veterans. The delay in putting a gigantic public-works program in operation is another factor to be considered. Experience has shown that considerable time is required to get public works under way and that the amount of employment they provide is always disappointing. Vast sums of borrowed money are spent without changing in any way the nature of the basic unemployment difficulties that must ultimately be overcome. Such projects necessarily develop slowly, and it will be a long time, perhaps a year or longer, before many men can be employed; and all the testimony of the most enthusiastic advocates of the plan shows that the entire sum of $3,300,000,000 will at the very utmost employ not over 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 men, leaving about 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 of America's unemployed still without work. It was brought out in the debates at a former session of Congress that it requires $3,600 of appropriation to provide one man with work on Federal-aid highways for 1 year; it requires $4,700 on rivers and harbors, and $5,600 on Treasury and post-office buildings.

That being the case, if the entire appropriation of $3,300,000,000 were spent in constructing public buildings, it would employ only 600,000 men for 1 year, which is a mere drop in the bucket, compared with the total unemployment. There would be considerable delay in employing 100,000. This bill would bring very little relief to the unemployed of the congressional district which I represent and to the State which I in part represent, but it would add heavily to the burden of our taxpayers and would discourage and dishearten our business men who are anxious, above all things, that the Budget shall be balanced and shall be kept balanced and that debt and taxes shall be held to the minimum so that business may be kept free from worry and may be provided with adequate working capital. Furthermore, when the projects for which this $3,300,000,000 is to be appropriated are completed, the work will cease, but the interest charge of $220,000,000, like the running brook, will go on forever. What will happen then? Shall we then appropriate another $3,300,000,000 and raise taxes again and by this futile process persist in believing that Uncle Sam can lift himself out of the economic mire by his boot straps?

It would be far better, in my opinion, if Congress would drop this bill, adjourn, and go home today and permit the natural processes of economic recovery to get into operation. I think that under the wise proposals of President Roosevelt, already enacted into statutes, business would soon begin to boom and there would be work for every honest man. If we enormously augment our bonded debt, raise taxes, and increase our fixed charges, we will be just that much farther away from the sound principles of a balanced Budget and minimized taxes which are so essential to the Nation's economic welfare.

I am sick and tired of taxes. The country is sick and tired of taxes. What the country needs is not more debt but less debt; not more taxes but less taxes.

Speaking as one Member of Congress, I have declared a moratorium on tax increases. The Lord helping me, I will not vote for any increase of taxes and I will not vote to pile another mountain of bonded debt on our people, because, as I see it, that will merely serve to prolong economic bondage and economic slavery in this country. Every time I have an opportunity I will vote to reduce the debt burden and the tax burden, but I will not vote to increase it.

Every day I have been a Member of this Congress I have had before me a vision of the economic slavery and distress created throughout the land by vast expenditures of the public moneys, with resultant effects in the form of confiscatory tax rates and a harvest of discouragements and woes that has plunged millions into distress and has caused many a man known for constancy and bravery to lose his nerve and face suicide rather than continue the unequal battle against depression, unemployment, and debts. Every day I have sent up a prayer to heaven to help me to stick on the economy wagon.

The good Lord must have heard me, for I am still on the economy wagon and I will be on it after this bill is passed. I started my congressional career on a straight-out program of economy and I am going to stick to it.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I make this extension of remarks for the purpose of clearly stating my position to my constitutents upon this all-important measure.

In the first place, I want to state that I worked and voted against the previous question on the gag rule, in order that the rule under which this measure was presented might be amended, and then voted against the gag rule itself, which did not permit any Member other than a member of the Committee on Ways and Means to offer an amendment or even an amendment to an amendment. Having done this, I do not feel that my affirmative vote on the final passage of this bill in any manner approves of many features which I consider obnoxious.

In the second place, I am of the opinion that $3,300,000,000 for a public-works program at this time is absolutely inadequate, although this sum might have been sufficient a year ago. At this time there is even a serious question whether a $6,000,000,000 public-works program would adequately supply employment for the majority of the unemployed.

I was disappointed to hear the Director of the Budget in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee state that the manner in which they arrived at the sum of $3,300,000,000 was not on the basis of the amount of employment it would furnish but upon the basis of what the administration considered the amount necessary for the construction of useful and, to a large extent, self-liquidating public-works projects. The human rights seem to have been ignored in favor of property rights.

Another feature of this bill which is abhorrent to me is that it provides for the issuance of over $3,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities, interest-bearing, just as they have always been. Some of us tried in every way possible to get the Ways and Means Committee to recommend the financing of this public-works project by way of Treasury notes authorized in the inflation bill. In our opinion, that was the only type of inflation which could really be justified at this time, in that it was inflation at the bottom, creating employment and consumers' purchasing power, and not at the top, as most inflation usually goes, for the protection and preservation of distressed bankers and money changers.

Being unable to invoke such inflation, the next question was that of the type of taxation which would be necessary to raise the revenue for the $220,000,000 annual interest payment and amortization. Again we worked and tried to persuade the responsible parties to adopt a system of taxation upon the issuance of Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes by our glorified bank for the private bankers, known as "the Federal Reserve System." We pointed out that they have a surplus today amounting to $280,000,000, and that a very nominal tax of one fourth of 1 percent upon the currency they issue to their members would bring in a revenue to the Government amounting to approximately two hundred to three hundred million dollars annually, but, as logical as this seems, it was not adopted.

A 50-percent increase on income taxes in the lowest bracket I think is basically and fundamentally wrong, particularly in view of the fact that the incomes in the higher brackets are treated ever so much more gently, and it is the hope of many of us that the Senate will rectify this wrong, and we have ample assurance that it will do so.

A further feature of this bill which I do not approve of is the three-fourths cent increase in the gasoline tax. In the State of Washington the tax already amounts to 6 cents per gallon, which in the minds of reasonable people is already exorbitant, particularly in view of the fact that there are so many other sources of what might be termed "untapped tax possibilities", particularly tax-exempt bonds.

The industrial control feature of this bill, which to a large extent modifies the antitrust laws, is to my mind an experiment of vast proportions and as a Member of Congress I do not feel as though I could vote against any measure that the President proposes during this emergency program upon which I have no definite campaign commitments to the contrary. It is my sincere hope that the administration will be able to successfully work out a planned economy with the hope uppermost in my mind that this planned integrated economy looks primarily to the consumer and only upon the producer as one who creates the things which the consumer wants and desires. There is no question among the more informed minds that the artificial increase in commodity prices today presents a grave danger, due to the fact that consumption has decreased rather than increased, and it is the hope of most of us that this psychological upturn does not get away from itself and bring another relapse which would undoubtedly be disastrous. We are headed in the right direction, providing we do not ignore basic economics on the way.

Although I voted against the committee amendment changing the apportionment of road funds to 50 percent to States by way of population, there is no doubt in my mind but what the Senate will right this wrong, due to the fact that more than 30 of our 48 States, as the bill now stands, stand to lose huge sums from the road funds, our State of Washington losing approximately $328,000. This amendment was adopted by sheer force of numbers by the representatives of the more densely populated sections, and mathematically they have no such power in the Senate, which has two Senators from each and every State.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, with that part of the bill relating to industrial recovery and with that part relating to public works I am in full and complete accord. A national emergency exists. Something besides drifting must be done, not only as a decent and humane act but as a necessary, intelligent, and constructive act to save this Nation, including its Constitution. No nation, even with a constitution, can long exist when millions of its best citizens are out of employment and hungry. These starving millions are interested in getting employment and something to eat. They do not give a continental about a constitution that fails in the midst of plenty to provide the necessities of life.

The progressives in this House do not agree with the conservatives that there is something in our Constitution that denies the people the right of self-preservation—the first and fundamental law of nature. It has been the do-nothing policy—the drifting policy of the past administration—that has made the laws, that my conservative colleagues and friends now so strenuously object to, absolutely essential and necessary. Their going and arriving nowhere—their standpatism—gave us the "new deal."

We are told that this bill is dangerous. Eloquently and sincerely, it is argued that this bill creates a dictatorship and that it is therefore unconstitutional. My conservative colleagues and friends forget that the Constitution is elastic; that it has been stretched until all its ribs have been cracked and that it can stand considerable additional stretching. They fail to comprehend that all civilization is in a transition; that we are going from the old to a new civilization. They forget that there is nothing in our Constitution that hampers and prevents progress.

While our Constitution is a masterpiece of fundamental legislation, yet there is nothing sacred about it. It was framed by our Revolutionary forefathers—the pioneers of America—able, intelligent, honorable men who had no intention to legislate for all the future of the Nation. They provided for a method by which the Constitution could be amended. The framers of our Constitution realized that nothing was permanent but change, that the Nation would grow, therefore they limited the Constitution to general principles of government. They had no intention of putting hobble skirts on Congress and hindering progress.

The wisdom of the framers of our Constitution, in limiting the Constitution to fundamental principles of government, is clearly shown when we realize that they lived in a different age, that they never talked over a telephone, never saw a steamboat, never rode in a train or an automobile, never thought of an airplane, and never listened to a radio, nor even dreamed of such things. Their wisdom was shown when they made the Constitution elastic—a Constitution that had within it the possibilities of the future development and growth of the Nation and its people.

Nothing is permanent but change. From our Government's early democratic beginning it gradually passed into the dictatorship of the international bankers, the tax dodgers, the corrupters of public morals, the House of Morgan, the "Greeks bearing gifts." Under and by virtue of the Constitution we are now engaged in passing the power of Government from Wall Street to the White House, to the Government of the United States under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and from there back to the people through an intelligent and enlightened public opinion.

We are confident that the Supreme Court will hold this legislation constitutional. This is the clear mandate given to the Court by the Preamble of the Constitution:

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic transquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Surely the Court will follow that mandate. We confidently entrust the constitutional question to our Supreme Court under that preamble.

While I voted for this bill under the gag rule, that gave no opportunity for amendment, I am not satisfied with all of its provisions. I am not satisfied with that part of the bill which provides for the issuing of $3,300,000,000 tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds. In place of these bonds we should have insisted that the President issue the $3,000,000,000 new currency authorized in the inflation bill. This new currency should be issued to finance the public works provided for in this bill. We cannot get out of this depression by going further in debt, by issuing more tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds. We have gone altogether too far in that direction in this Congress. If nothing else, let us at least authorize the President to use the $2,000,000,000 Federal Reserve bank notes that are already printed and ready for delivery in the Bureau of Engraving. The banks do not want them; why not use them to finance public works?

Neither am I satisfied with the revenue provisions. The tax provisions of this bill were written by the Budget Director, Lewis Douglas, who cut the heart out of the disabled veterans' compensation and crucified his comrades in order to become a coupon clippers' hero, and who is now attempting to place the burden of the unemployed upon the people with small incomes. Let us hope that the Senate will amend this bill in accordance with the above suggestions. That will lighten the tax burden and will expand the currency at the bottom, where it ought to be expanded.

Let me repeat that nearly all the legislation that we have passed during this special session of Congress became possible, and even necessary, because of the aimless drifting, and going nowhere, of the past administration. The standpatters had abused the public's patience altogether too long. The necessity of this bill, and of others, could have been avoided if, when this special session convened, we had passed the Frazier bill refinancing farm indebtedness and the Patman bill paying the soldiers in cash, not by issuing bonds but by issuing currency. This would have expanded the currency where it ought to be expanded and the depression would have ended.

In conclusion, I readily concede that most of the legislation passed during this session of Congress will not have the desired, or hoped-for result. It will not end the depression. There must be a real and an intelligent expansion of the currency.

The Frazier bill provides for such an expansion. A petition to bring the bill onto the floor of the House is now on the Speaker's desk. Twenty State legislatures have petitioned Congress to pass this bill. They are: Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Wisconsin. May I take this occasion to ask my colleagues and friends from the above States to go to the Speaker's desk and sign that petition. May I ask them to take heed of the mandate that their State legislatures gave them.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, of course every Member is anxious to do everything possible to speedily effect national industrial recovery, and each Member can see great benefits to be derived from this vast sum of $3,300,000,000 to be expended in the erection and construction of useful and permanent public works; however, it is impossible to appropriate any such sum of money from an already depleted Treasury, and if and when bonds and securities are issued and sold, as provided in this bill, then the question occurs, How is the still depleted Treasury going to pay the interest on this vast sum of money?

We had been advised that this was an administration bill, and that it was in pursuance of the President's message, and that it was a part of his program, and that it would effect national industrial recovery. Now I am for this bill if ways and means can be worked out to raise the $227,000,000 per year necessary to pay the interest and amortization charge on the $3,300,000,000 which is to be used to encourage national industrial recovery. But I am not willing to vote for this bill if the raising of the interest and amortization money is to cast an unjust additional load upon the so-called "little man", as is now proposed by this bill.

Many of the ways and means, as set out in this bill, to raise this interest money and the amortization charge, run absolutely contrary to State campaign pledges of many of the majority Members of this House, and absolutely contrary to State platforms upon which they were elected, and also, as in my instance, contrary to State legislative resolutions and memorials, and, Mr. Speaker, it is contrary to section 2 of the national platform upon which every one of the majority Members of this House were elected.

According to this bill as it is now before us, the program of raising the interest and carrying charge is decidedly unilateral. It places all of the burden upon the consumer and the small taxpayer, and it exempts the large taxpayer and the rich man. In that respect it is in violation of paragraph 2 of the National Democratic platform of 1932, which provides:

> We advocate: Maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

As this bill is now before the House I am in accord with it except for the way it proposes to finance the appropriations. There are many outstanding and legitimate reasons why I must oppose that feature.

First, this bill seeks to increase the income tax by 50 percent on the individual having an income of $6,000 or less; then it abruptly starts to graduate downward so that the individual with an income of $30,000 is increased by only 15 percent; the person with an income of $50,000 is increased by 11 percent; the person with an income of $100,000 is increased by 6 percent, and the person with an income of $200,000 is increased by only 4½ percent, and the person with an income of a million dollars or more is increased by only 3½ percent.

The persons from whom the greater portion of the money is expected to be raised by amendment of the income-tax law are the butchers, the bakers, the small merchants, the average professional man, the men and women of small salaries; in fact, all those with small incomes and small salaries. The man drawing a salary of not to exceed $6,000 is loaded with a 50-percent increase, while the man on a $30,000 salary is increased by only 15 percent, and the one drawing $50,000 is increased by only 11 percent, and the one with a $100,000 salary by only 6 percent. I ask you fairly and candidly, are those increases based on ability to pay?

Is it fair to increase the Government burden of the men in the lower brackets by 50 percent and then graduate those in the upper brackets down to only 3½ percent? Is it fair to collect the major portion of these increases from those least able to pay? Is it fair to grant this class of favors to those able to pay and at the same time put this additional burden on the so-called "little man", who, with his wife, is striving to properly educate their children—the man who in fact deprives himself and wife of all luxuries of life and gets his only enjoyment in using his entire income in the maintenance of his family and the education of his children?

Is that in accord with the Democratic plaform to raise revenues by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay? Is there a man here who can vote for this provision and then excuse himself to his constitutents? Well, I will never be called upon to make any such excuse, for I will never vote exempting those in the upper brackets and at the same time put additional burdens on those in the lower.

Instead of relieving those in the upper brackets from further governmental responsibility I would strengthen the law to see that they paid their just share for the support of their Government. The investigation that is now going on in the other end of the Capitol has developed that J. P. Morgan, probably the richest individual in all of America, has escaped taxes for the past 3 years, during all of which time his manipulations to do so have been well known to the Treasury Department of this Government and its Internal Revenue branch, yet they have never brought that to the attention of this Congress, so that the holes in the law through which he has been crawling could be plugged and he be forced to equitably contribute to the support of his Government. But we are not surprised at that, since Mellon and Mills, the two Secretaries of the Treasury under whose administration he has been doing these things, both received from the Treasury they were sworn to guard, unjust refunds to the extent of millions of dollars each. Now that these things have come to light it is high time that Congress corrected these mistakes in the law and in procedure so that the millionaires will be compelled to pay their just taxes in support of their Government, and further, we must see that when they have once paid their just share, it stays paid.

The second reason that this bill is objectionable is that it is increasing the Government excise tax on gasoline by 75 percent. This is inexcusable. It is a sales tax already preempted by the States and already overworked by the Government. It is putting the burden upon the consumer and not upon the producer. Again this bill hits the "little fellow" and exempts the Rockefellers. Ninety percent of the agricultural products of this country today are produced by gasoline power instead of horse power, as in former years. Gasoline and the motor vehicle are as much a necessity today as the horse and buggy and the wagon and team were 30 years ago. Every State in the Union now has a gasoline tax, ranging from 2 to 7 cents per gallon, and already the Government has a 1-cent tax on every gallon of gasoline sold in this country. Further pyramiding of such tax is absolutely against the code of fair practice. Bear in mind the oil industry does not share any of the burden of these gasoline taxes. They are all paid by the consumer. My State has a 5-cent gasoline tax, and that, with the present 1-cent Government tax, makes a burden which has reached its limit. We cannot stand this proposed increase.

The people of my State in March of this year spoke to me through their legislature, which unanimously passed a memorial asking Congress not only not to increase the excise tax on gasoline but to reduce the present tax. They are the people whom I represent, and it is from them I take instruction and not from those representing the interests desiring special favors, benefits, immunities, and subsidies.

My third objection to the bill as it now stands is the allotment of the $400,000,000 road money. By the law we have long been operating under, Federal road money has been allotted to the States on the basis of one third for population, one third on area, and one third on road mileage. That basis is equitable. This bill now provides the allotment of one fourth on mileage, one fourth on area, and one half on population. This unjustly affects 30 of the 48 States, and it affects them to the tune of $20,400,000, all of which is done to the benefit, in that same sum of additional money, to 17 other States, leaving only 1 State in its normal condition.

My own State is the heaviest loser of all, with a loss of $1,668,000. New York under this amendment gains most with an additional $5,200,000. Pennsylvania comes next with a gain of $3,860,000, and Massachusetts third with a gain of $2,000,000. Even Rhode Island, not as large as the smallest county in my district, has a gain of $60,000, and this notwithstanding the fact that Rhode Island, except that part which is covered with water, is practically blanketed with pavement.

The following table, which I ask leave to insert, gives in round numbers the loss or gain of each State:

State	Amount gained	Amount lost
Arkansas		$236,000
Alabama	$28,000
Arizona		1,102,000
California	736,000
Colorado		1,000,000

[1] Practically even.

This is an admitted and deliberate change of the law allotting Federal money for roads to the States in order to help the States of dense population. It is being done under the claim that there is more unemployment and distress in the thickly populated centers, but in making that claim let us be mindful that these thickly populated centers already have the greatest network of paved roads in all the world, and again let us be mindful that under the other provisions of this bill for public works these thickly populated centers are receiving vast benefits based on the theory of population.

It has been suggested to me that since I am in favor of the national industrial recovery principles of the bill that I should vote for it and take a chance that the Senate would correct the provisions on financing it. But I am not here to gamble that the Senate will correct my errors. The people of my district sent me here to vote my own convictions and primarily to represent them. My district is made up largely of those classes which have been most oppressed during this panic. They are of the classes that the financing program of this bill hits the hardest. It has been suggested to me that my duty in Congress is to represent all of the people and all of the concerns of this Nation, but I interpret my duty to be that I must first and primarily represent my own district, its people, and its industries. My brief experience here has brought me to the solemn belief that it is impossible to represent all of the people all of the time. One cannot at the same time represent the oppressed and the oppressor, the robbed and the robber, the poor and the rich. It cannot be done. Under our system their positions are different because of the absolute conflict of interest.

I took the position in the campaign that we had had too much congressional representation of the big bankers, of the power companies, of the public-service companies, of the railroads, of the insurance companies, and of the richer class in general. I believe that they should all have a fair deal, but I do not believe they should have the special privileges that are written for them in this bill. My vote for this bill as it now stands would be a vote for them and a vote against the small business man, the professional man, the farmer, the rancher, the person generally of smaller means. The national industrial recovery program of this bill can be financed without penalizing them, and it should be so financed.

Instead of increasing the income tax on the small taxpayer by 50 percent and graduating it down to an increase of only 3½ percent on the millionaire, let us put the monkey wrench on this provision and turn it square around, and let us correct the defects of the income-tax law and particularly those defects which have come to light by the Morgan investigation, and let us place a tax upon the income from tax-exempt securities and let us make public records of income-tax returns. These things would pay the interest and the carrying charge of the money proposed to be used for national industrial recovery.

One of the greatest plugs that could be driven into the hole of the income-tax law through which men, who should be in the upper brackets, escape, would be to make all income-tax returns open public records subject to examination and inspection by any other taxpayer. This would do more to force honest returns than any other present suggestion.

There is no legitimate reason why these income-tax returns should be secret. All property-tax returns throughout the United States are matters of public record. Income-tax returns are the only secret returns that I know of. I do not understand why the income-tax returns should be shrouded in secrecy while the property-tax returns are open public records. No man should be ashamed of his honest and legitimate income. I believe that the opposition to making the income-tax returns a public record comes from those whose income is either not altogether legitimate or from those who desire to juggle figures and to escape through holes which they have discovered to exist in the income-tax law.

If publicity were given income-tax returns, I feel certain that it would put an end to the juggling which goes on by individuals and concerns on the last day of one taxpaying year and the first day of the next. I am sure it would eliminate the system of selling large volumes of capital stock on the last day of a tax-paying year at a great paper loss—which sales are made to the wives, relatives, and confidential friends of the stockholder—and then on the first days of the next year these stocks are transferred back to the original holder at a large price so that he can again at the end of that year make another fake sale at another great paper loss, thus evading the law from year to year. That is one of the holes in the income tax law that would be plugged by publicity of the returns.

Another thing that would be corrected by making the income-tax returns a public record is the present salary and pension system that is going on with the large banks and the large railroad companies and other large corporate concerns. Hundred-thousand-dollar salaries and hundred-thousand-dollar pensions to retired directors and retired officers would cease. This would help in two ways: It would increase the tax to be paid by the concern, and it would leave more money in the treasury of the concern to be distributed to the unsuspecting stockholder as a dividend.

That the income tax may be extended to the income from tax-exempt securities to me seems perfectly clear, notwithstanding the argument is made that such inclusion would be unconstitutional. We get our authority for the present income tax law from the sixteenth amendment to the National Constitution, which is very short, plain, and inevasive, and since it contains only 30 words I shall quote it:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

This amendment authorizes Congress "to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever sources derived." Now, as a lawyer I would advise any client who came to me that the coupons on his Liberty bonds or on any other tax-exempt securities that he might have were subject to an income tax if Congress saw fit to levy one. In these times it seems only reasonable that such a tax be levied, and that it be an independent tax not to be charged against other losses.

The evidence taken before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, now investigating private banks, disclosed on the very first day of the hearing, last Tuesday, May 23, 1933, that the House of Morgan owned, on December 31, 1932, $224,580,150 worth of United States Government securities. Those securities alone carry quite an income, yet the evidence taken on the same day shows that neither the House of Morgan nor any of its members paid a tax for the year 1932.

The publicity which is being given income-tax returns made by men in high places by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee is in itself going to be a great benefit to the Treasury of this country. I predict that if Mr. Pecora is permitted to go on with his investigation many persons will soon be filing amended returns for past years, explaining that they had made mistakes and that they had taken deductions and set forth depreciations under erroneous advice or misapprehension of the law.

This proposition of sales by taxpayers to members of their own family and to close associates, and resales back to the taxpayer, at the close of one year and at the beginning of another at figures juggled to show great paper losses to the taxpayer, is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law.

The present system of ridiculous salaries to corporation officers and superridiculous pensions to retired officers of corporations would be greatly reduced if income-tax returns were public records.

Now, since this bill is considered in the House under a rule whereby no amendments can be offered except by the committee that reported it, I am constrained to vote against it, but I do hope that it will come back from the Senate with these objectionable features eliminated, and with amendments to finance the recovery plan of the bill by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay as proclaimed by the Democratic national platform. Then I shall vote for it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, as no time was given me for discussion on this bill, I take this means of presenting my viewpoints on H.R. 5664, known as the "industrial recovery bill."

While I perhaps will vote for this measure, I recognize it as a veritable TNT bomb which may wreck the sinews of government unless honestly and fairly applied.

In this bill, we are acknowledging the bankruptcy of the United States, especially as it pertains to our industrial activities. We are authorizing a receivership in the hands of our President, in whom, I am sure, the majority of our people today have the utmost confidence, to which I also subscribe. However, as the administration of this bill is so vast, I am fearful whether or not he may not be surrounded with advisers whose theories and methods of application may not be in synchronism with his; and he cannot examine into the various details, a condition may arise where his best intentions may go awry.

We witnessed this in the Veterans' Administration, where an effort is now being made to ameliorate the iniquitous regulations which our President approved, trusting, as he did, implicitly in his advisers, who, in this instance, in my opinion, are incompetent, unfair, and more or less have placed themselves in the category of racketeers.

I propose to vote for this bill because it carries provisions which will put some of our unemployed to work, which to me is the most valid argument why I must swallow this sugar-coated pill weighted, as it is, in its interior with the bitterest quinine, in that it attacks the right of the individual to conduct his own business according to the dictates of his own conscience and his own desires, and, further, because it seems to me unconstitutional as well.

Personally I will sacrifice anything to bring a ray of sunshine and hope to our unemployed, and in accordance with this thought I swallow, quite reluctantly, the tax provisions of this bill as well.

The increased income tax for only those in the lower brackets, while those in the higher brackets are left untouched, is contrary to the principles of democracy and disproves the allegation that in this bill equal rights of all men are being considered.

The gasoline tax is also class legislation and ought not to be enacted.

While I have, in principle, been more or less opposed to the manufacturers' sales tax, I am inclined to favor a sales tax, provided it does not touch the necessities of life and the requirements of the common man along the lines of food, clothing, and medicine. I vision that a proper sales tax, touching upon the sales of every manufactured commodity and every transaction in government, especially stock transfers, bond transfers, and realty transfers will be a most progressive, far-reaching, and remunerative tax.

If, in addition to this, we will institute higher gift, estates, and inheritance taxes, our basic problems of taxation will be solved; and concretely speaking, under this procedure, taxation will be applied primarily to those who have and who can afford it rather than to those who have little and can ill afford it.

The Morgan exposé and the failure of this gentleman and others of his caliber to pay an income tax evinces the thought that if a proper manufacturers' sales tax, along the lines indicated before, is adopted, the income tax in itself can and should be repealed for the lower incomes and increased for the higher. Today, the income tax is merely an evasive tax, through which artful lawyers close their eyes to honest methods and protect their clients for a fee.

I have always abhored the income tax in its application to those in the lower brackets, since men today, with the most meager incomes, are taxed, regardless of the fact that perhaps in the year to come or succeeding years they may be deprived of any income.

If an income tax is to be maintained, the minimum should be placed much higher than under existing law and the tax should be greater on unearned income rather than on earned income.

Speaking in the interest of labor, and being fully cognizant of what happened in 1920 when the railroads were under Government control, I am apprehensive whether or not, under this bill, it may not be possible again for the administration virtually to conscript labor, as was done under the Wilson administration during the railroad strike of 1920, when railroad employees who struck for higher and livable wages compared with the high standards of living existing at that time were put in imprisonment because they dared to assert their individualistic rights to refuse to work for a remuneration not to their liking.

My only hope and the reason that I vote for this bill is that I have the best interests of the unemployed at heart and that I feel confident the President will exercise the powers granted him under this bill humanely, compassionately, and in justice, and my hope is that those who administer the law will be of a more fair-minded, intelligent, and considerate group than those who, in the administration of the veterans economy law, have brought upon the administration the onus of criticism and severe censure.

This bill fails to go far enough to satisfy me on the question of providing employment, and my sincere hope, which I express quite freely, is that the Members of this Congress, when they go home and contact their own constituents, will see for themselves the inadequacy of this legislation, and that on their return in January, they will redouble their efforts to obtain sufficient funds in order to provide more adequately employment for our unfortunate and distressed unemployed. With this hope, I close my eyes and will vote to support this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the issue here is not political, or at least it should not be political; the question is: Do you want to continue to support your President in his efforts to bring the country out of this depression?

Since the 4th day of March there has been action at the White House. For 3 years prior thereto the country was permitted to drift, with the result that conditions continued to become worse. The Nation was on the verge of destruction when Mr. Roosevelt assumed command. Who can deny that there has been a change? Confidence has been restored and we are slowly recovering. There is, however, much still to be done. In order to continue the march, the ultimate goal being a return to prosperity, President Roosevelt asks us for this unprecedented legislation. It is a bill to further encourage the recovery of national industry; to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works. Of course it violates the principles laid down by Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, but, my friends, if any of those great statesmen were in the White House today, they would find not a country such as they knew it, but a changed country. In fact, as Mr. Charles G. Ross, the Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch says: "They would find themselves in a wonderland."

What might have been good medicine for the country ills then would likely be poison today. I shudder to even think what would have happened to an individual, let alone a President, who would have suggested such a bill 10 years ago. I might even say 2 years ago. We must remember that it requires extraordinary action to meet an extraordinary situation.

The report says the bill is designed to meet the needs of the present national emergency which, in the language of section 1, is "productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standard of living of the American people." The President, in his message to the Congress May 17, said:

> My first request is that the Congress provide for the machinery necessary for a great cooperative movement throughout all industry in order to obtain wide reemployment, to shorten the working week, to pay a decent wage for the shorter week, and to prevent unfair competition and disastrous overproduction.
> Employers cannot do this singly or even in organized groups, because such action increases costs and thus permits cutthroat underselling by selfish competitors unwilling to join in such a public-spirited endeavor.
>
> One of the great restrictions upon such cooperative efforts up to this time has been our antitrust laws. They were properly designed as the means to cure the great evils of monopolistic price fixing. They should certainly be retained as a permanent assurance that the old evils of unfair competition shall never return. But the public interest will be served if, with the authority and under the guidance of Government, private industries are permitted to make agreements and codes insuring fair competition. However, if it is necessary, if we thus limit the operation of antitrust laws to their original purpose, we must provide a rigorous licensing power in order to meet rare cases of noncooperation and abuse. Such a safeguard is indispensable.
> The other proposal gives the Executive full power to start a large program of direct employment. A careful survey convinces me that approximately $3,300,000,000 can be invested in useful and necessary public construction, and at the same time put the largest possible number of people to work.
>
> Provision should be made to permit States, counties, and municipalities to undertake useful public works, subject, however, to the most effective possible means of eliminating favoritism and wasteful expenditures on unwarranted and uneconomic projects.
> We must, by prompt and vigorous action, override unnecessary obstructions which in the past have delayed the starting of public-works programs. This can be accomplished by simple and direct procedure * * *."

This bill gives the President the legislation he desires. We can only pray that it will meet the objective that he seeks—a return to prosperity.

In again supporting the President I express the hope that he will be careful to see that no subordinate permits the old evils of unfair competition to return. The extraordinary power that is granted calls for extraordinary precaution.

Now, as to the public-works feature, $3,300,000,000 is to be used, the President says, for useful and necessary public construction. The President demands the raising of $220,000,000 to pay the interest and sinking-fund charges on the $3,300,000,000 necessary to finance the public works.

It is a most unpleasant duty to increase taxes. The committee recommends an increase in normal income-tax rates on the first $4,000 of net income from 4 percent to 6 percent; in excess of $4,000 the rate is increased from 8 percent to 10 percent. The man who formerly paid $20 on $3,000 will pay $30; on $4,000 will pay $90 instead of $60; on $5,000 the tax is $150, an increase of $50; on $6,000 there is an increase of $70, to $210; on $7,000 an increase of $90, making the tax now $300; while on $10,000 the new tax will be $630 in lieu of $480 under the old law. The increase, of course, applies to all incomes above $10,000.

There is also an additional tax of three fourths of a cent per gallon on gasoline.

Much as I dislike to see the increase in income and gasoline taxes, still it is far better than a general sales tax.

There is a provision in the bill that when and if the States repeal the eighteenth amendment the taxes referred to will become inoperative. I am very much in favor of this provision, and I hope it will expedite action by the States.

It seems to me that the so-called "non-tax-paying States", the States that take more out of the Federal Treasury in the form of Federal aid than they actually pay in, owe it to the Government to assist at once in providing a way to collect sufficient revenue to meet its requirements.

If something is not done, I can vision a discontinuance, in the near future, of many activities where the Government is now extending aid to the States.

I present, Mr. Speaker, a chart received from the Treasury Department showing the extent of Federal aid in all of its ramifications to the individual States:

NOTE.—This statement does not include appropriations made by Congress for direct relief or loans to States on account of floods, hurricanes, fires, drought, etc.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Most of the Federal-aid appropriations are termed "permanent appropriations." They recur annually. As an indication of the continuous growth take the Extension Service of the Department of Agriculture. Originating in 1914 with the passage of the Smith-Lever Act, the appropriation for the fiscal year 1915 was $10,000 to each State, or a total of $480,000. This service was extended until we find $8,649,649.90 appropriated for the fiscal year ending July 1 last. To this the States in the same year spent approximately $15,000,000. Not only do we extend aid to the several States, all participating, but recently laws have been enacted which bring in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska. From a handful of men operating the Extension Service it has grown until now there is an army of 6,000 men and women throughout the Nation engaged in this activity. The home demonstration agent, a woman, has entered the picture. The woman is a "home planner." She spends her time showing the housewife how to improve her housekeeping, covering every phase from equipping the home to canning the fruit and vegetables. About 20 percent of the total amount spend is used for "home demonstration" work.

According to the Census Bureau there are 3,073 counties in the United States. This means on an average of two extension agents for each county. Some counties do not have an extension agent. In South Carolina there are six or seven extension agents in some of the counties.

The job of the extension agent is to help the farmer earn more on what he produces; to pass along to him information of value secured through scientific research. For years they have shown the farmer how to increase production. The job was performed so well that such a surplus developed that the price of farm products was recently at the lowest point it has reached since the Civil War. We appropriated $60,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture proper, not including road appropriations, for the next fiscal year. The duties of this Department are to stimulate agriclulture in all its phases. We appropriated this year over $100,000,000 to loan to the farmers for crop production. That money is being loaned now. Then we pass a bill, the farm relief bill, which has as its main purpose a reduction in yield. This does not appear good logic. Money to show the farmer how to increase production, money for the farmer to plant crops, and then a scheme that will cost consumers hundreds of millions to lower production. It appears to me that it is time for the Secretary of Agriculture to reach some definite agreement as to what we should and should not do. Surely it is not wise to appropriate money for a given purpose and then make more money available to reach our objective directly in opposition to the first proposal.

Another activity that has expanded from year to year is the experiment stations. For the year ending July 1, 1932, the Federal Government set aside $4,356,591.68. Of course, under the law the States were required to match this amount, making at least a total of $8,713,183.36.

There is an immense duplication of work.

Then you have your vocational education, aid to colleges for agricultural and mechanical arts, forest-fire cooperation, and whatnot.

The point I desire to drive home is that the Federal Government cannot carry on in the future as it has in the past unless additional revenue is raised. The repeal of the eighteenth amendment will enable the Government to raise well over half a billion dollars in taxes. Are the "dry States" which have the right to keep liquor from coming within their borders to deny the Government this revenue of taxation? If they do, I predict there will be an end to the Federal aid they are now receiving. It just cannot go on unless the money is made available.

The people of the "dry States" should understand the situation that confronts the Government. If the situation is properly understood, the eighteenth amendment will be speedily repealed as it should be in the interests of temperance.

Has any harm come from the legalization of 3.2 percent beer? Nothing but good has come to the country from the enactment of that legislation. There is not a State in the Union, no matter how dry that State is, that has not benefited by the passage of that act. Take, for instance, Mississippi. I am told that residents of that State, as dry a State as there is in the Union, are working overtime securing the lumber that goes into the making of the shipping cases.

I repeat that if the dry States do not assist in repealing the eighteenth amendment, they cannot expect a continuance of the Federal aid they have been receiving from the Government.

The public-works feature of the bill will put millions to work in this country who have been out of employment for several years. It will give the honest man an opportunity to earn a proper living for his family. That the President means to expedite this feature of the legislation is assured, for he is now having every State in the Union submit suggestions of projects that might be financed under the provisions of the measure. Just as soon as the bill becomes a law the President should revoke the stop order on the public buildings issued about 60 days ago. Many of these projects can be started within 30 days. Put the unemployed to work and the depression will disappear. This is what the President is trying to do and he deserves our support.

THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY IN 1933

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, when the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party failed to solve the problems of Great Britain after the World War, the farmers, the workers, and the soldiers of that Empire turned to the British Labor Party. The despised Ramsay MacDonald, who had opposed England's entry into the World War and who had suffered much abuse and insult, came into power with the Labor Party. MacDonald himself was one of the builders of that party.

In 1927 and 1928 I traveled through England, Denmark, Finland, the Soviet Union, Sweden, Germany, Belgium, and France, and I visited 7 of the capitals of these 8 countries, and I found the Labor Party in control or about to assume control in every country in which I visited. Social-service legislation, old-age pension, unemployment insurance, and other legislation along the lines of public service was far in advance of legislation in America. Europe has much to learn from America, but it must be said that America has much to learn from Europe, and one of the things that we must learn is that some day a great labor party will come to the fore in the United States.

Already the Farmer-Labor Party has captured the State of Minnesota. We have there a Farmer-Labor Governor, Farmer-Labor Lieutenant Governor, Farmer-Labor attorney general, Farmer-Labor railroad and warehouse commissioner. We have there the senior United States Senator, and at one time we had a junior United States Senator; and we have five Farmer-Labor Congressmen now in Congress. The Farmer-Labor Party also controls the house of representatives in the State of Minnesota and many other offices which could be mentioned.

The Farmer-Labor Party rose out of agricultural problems and labor problems following the World War, and it is now being given added impetus by the problems of the veterans. At every step of the road the Farmer-Labor organizations and the Farmer-Labor platforms have given a friendly hand to our service men.

A number of States surrounding Minnesota and in the Mississippi Valley and in the far West have had at one time or another small beginnings of a Farmer-Labor Party organization. At some future time I hope to give some Farmer-Labor history along that line. I also hope to give a clearer and better picture of Farmer-Labor history in Minnesota.

A Farmer-Labor National Convention was held in 1920 in Chicago; another convention was held in St. Paul in 1924, and there were efforts along that line in 1928 and 1932. Independent organizations and various committees and leagues for independent political action have struggled to gather the disorganized progressive and liberal forces of this country into a solid, fighting unit. I invite these organizations and forces to join battle under the banners of the Farmer-Labor Party, building in 1933 and 1934 a national organization and a national party.

Now is the time to prepare for the Presidential election of 1936, and we must capture many additional seats in Congress and in the United States Senate in 1934. Remember that as far back as 41 years ago the People's Party, almost a duplicate of the Farmer-Labor Party of today, with a militant program in 1892, captured more than 1,000,000 votes for President in that early day. Fusion destroyed that party in 1896. The alluring promises of the Democratic Party with a progressive, liberal leader, eloquent and appealing to the masses, brought about the destruction of the People's Party. It is entirely possible that if that party had continued actively as a separate unit it might have taken over the Government by 1912.

Whenever a new party rises along labor lines insidious forces seek to disrupt and destroy these organizations. It is continually preached from the housetops that third parties never survive, and those who preach that forget that the Republican Party was once a third party, and that nearly all parties in the world today were at some stage of history third parties, and even fourth and fifth parties. There is nothing to that argument; in fact, it is not an argument at all. It is merely a misleading statement which has no foundation.

One of the great problems has been to bring solidly behind this Labor Party the American Federation of Labor with its millions of organized workers. It would seem that in these days of thirteen to seventeen million unemployed reported by various organizations that labor ought to build their own party. The Hamilton Institute of New York City vouches for unemployment figures of more than 17,000,000. This has no doubt slightly decreased this spring. We find good cooperation everywhere through farm organizations and cooperatives.

There has been great poverty and destitution and suffering in America for some time. Certainly it ought to be plain by now that there is no relief and hope to be found in the old parties, controlled as they are by organized wealth, money trusts, international bankers, such as the House of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. and other great banking firms. The march of their millions is heard throughout the land, and their dollars are constantly rolling into the tills of newspaper and magazine offices, radio chains, and into the pockets of lecturers and propagandists.

Read the Pujo investigation of 21 years ago, which is published in three volumes by the United States Government. This investigation was brought about through the gallant, militant leader, Charles A. Lindbergh, Sr., for 10 years a Congressman from Minnesota, and father of the famous flier. He continually spoke of the Money Trust and that the Money Trust should be investigated. He spoke of the evils to come from the Federal Reserve System. He wrote many books, such as The Economic Pinch, Banking and Currency, Why Your Country Is at War, and numerous pamphlets, and his speeches are a source of inspiration and may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the period from March 4, 1907, to March 4, 1917.

The captains of industry are in absolute control of this country today. Their power is unlimited and they reach far beyond the shores of America into foreign lands. Their power must be tamed lest America be destroyed. Tell me what power will bring them to book? Will the conservative parties do that? I cannot believe that, with the wildest stretch of the imagination.

Unless a party is builded in this country, rooted in the workers of the soil and the workers of the hand and brain in offices and cities, supported and encouraged by millions of service men—I say unless such a party is builded relief for the people will be a long time arriving. Since 90 percent of the people are farmers and workers of the hand and of the brain, and since they are cemented by the service men in every rank of life—since all have a common foe; here are the elements for a great new party.

Howard Y. Williams, national director of the League for Independent Political Action, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City, is actively at work now along these lines and has been for some years. He is assisted by a group of splendid men headed by John Dewey, famous educator and writer. The Farmer-Labor Leader, St. Paul, Minn., is a State-wide organization paper. The Labor Review, of Minneapolis, Minn., and the Union Advocate, of St. Paul, Minn., labor papers, will gladly send you information, I am sure.

On May 16, 1933, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech, "Intelligent National Planning, a New Political Alinement by the Organization of Farmers, Workers, and Veterans." This speech may be secured by writing to Mr. Williams at the address which I have given; and I will be very pleased to hear from you, and my office at Washington is at the service and disposal of the great American people who are interested in the building of a great national Farmer-Labor Party.

A short time ago, on June 3, 1933, I placed in the RECORD material under the title of "Farmer-Labor Governor in Action", Floyd B. Olson's two inaugural addresses and other statements and resolutions. I am giving this information to the American public that they may know they are not alone in the hope for a new party, progressive, liberal, militant, for the people, and against the money power which is crushing us to the earth with bonds and interest in a cruel money system which must be revised and rebuilt to serve the people.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, first I have been requested by the following Members to state that they are unavoidably absent, and if present they would vote "aye" on this bill: Mrs. NORTON, Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin, Mr. WOOD of Missouri, Mr. ABERNETHY, Mr. MARLAND, and Mr. KERR.

Mr. Speaker, as to the program for tomorrow, I am going to ask the House to adjourn until 12 o'clock tomorrow. There is nothing on the calendar and absolutely no business will be transacted. This adjournment is being taken solely for the purpose of permitting one and possibly two committees to report bills to the House in order that we may have something to do on Monday in addition to the two or three suspensions which will be recognized by the Speaker.

It is my hope that in addition to the suspensions which will be recognized by the Speaker we will be able to take up a bill which was introduced today by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] relating to the payment of obligations of the Government in gold; in other words, it provides for their payment in lawful money acceptable in the payment of private debts and obligations.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will that be considered under a rule?

Mr. BYRNS. That will be considered under a rule, and I hope under an open rule.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. What about Tuesday, Decoration Day?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not want to destroy the gentleman's speech, but he can reserve his speech against other kinds of rules for a later date.

Mr. KELLER. How about Decoration Day, Tuesday?

Mr. BYRNS. It has been the custom of the House to meet on Decoration Day and I think we can render a patriotic service if we come here and dispose of this legislation. It is my hope and my expectation that on Tuesday we will take up the farm credit bill. But I have stated to several gentleman that if the House is willing, we will not have any record vote upon that day, but will have the record vote upon Wednesday. In fact, I hardly think we can conclude the consideration of the bill in one day.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell us what suspensions will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. BYRNS. I would refer the gentleman to the Speaker for that information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there are three suspensions. The Chair does not think they are particularly important.

One is the bill (H.R. 5690) to legalize the sale and possession of beer in Oklahoma, provided the State permits the sale of beer. Another one is the Hawaiian governorship bill, and the third relates to an amendment of the National Defense Act, which has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

REGULATION OF BANKING

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill [H.R. 5661] to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. STEAGALL, GOLDSBOROUGH, and LUCE.

PURCHASE OF STOCKS AND BONDS OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, Senate 1094, to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, with House amendments, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is the bill in which the House struck out the $17,500 limitation on salaries of officials of the company?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is the insurance bill. It is a Senate bill which was passed by the House.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the chairman of the commitee if he will permit me to read a brief telegram from the Mayor of the City of St. Paul.

Mr. STEAGALL. I shall be very pleased to.

Mr. KVALE. This telegram is from the Mayor of the City of St. Paul and reads as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 26.

Hon. PAUL KVALE,
Representative in Congress:

Ramsey County poor relief must be borne jointly by city and county. Our amendment to Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act authorized purchase of city and county bonds, also provisions were incorporated to insure legal issue of bonds. City and county cannot pledge bonds, must sell. Imperative wording our amendment be incorporated in act.

WILLIAM MAHONEY,
Mayor, City of St. Paul.

Is there any way in which the gentleman can see that the amendment I offered, but withdrew on the assurance of the committee, can be considered in conference? I know that there is only a limited time for operation, but the emergency is dire in this particular situation.

Mr. STEAGALL. All I can say to the gentleman is that I am very much in sympathy with his position. I cannot assure him, of course, what will be done. I cannot say more than to express my own feeling about it.

I may also say to the gentleman that under legislation, now evidently in process of final passage at an early date, the relief contemplated in the telegram the gentleman read could no longer be afforded by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. KVALE. I am sensible of that, but there will be some little space of time within which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will still operate.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's efforts.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the chairman a question. As I understand, the gentleman is asking that we insist upon the committee amendment in the House which struck out the $17,500 salary limitation. Is it the gentleman's intention to insist on the position of the House?

Mr. STEAGALL. We expect to uphold the position of the House so far as that may be possible. That is all I can say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

REGULATION OF BANKING

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1094) with House amendments, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. STEAGALL, GOLDSBOROUGH, and LUCE.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the bill, H.R. 5755, and include a protest by some of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, to begin with let me say that I commend the President of the United States for the noble motives that impel him as a leader of this country to fight the battle of unemployment, and I commend the Ways and Means Committee for their sincere consideration and hard work that they have exerted in regard to this bill; and while I am hopeful if this bill becomes a law that it will, if possible, assist in restoring prosperity in this country if such methods can restore prosperity, yet, nevertheless, I have my own views in regard to this matter, which I wish to present at this time.

The people of the Fourth Congressional District of Kansas are demanding a cessation of governmental waste and extravagance, a reduction of governmental expenses, and are opposed at this time and at all time to an increase in the rates of taxation and innumerable sales taxes that are generally employed in times of war.

The farmers of the Fourth Congressional District do not agree with President Hoover that the antitrust laws should be made more liberal, but believe the antitrust laws should be strengthened and enforced.

This, Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, is taken from the statement that I issued when I announced for Congress last year and the platform that I was nominated and elected on. When I made these statements, I was honest and sincere in them. Surely I cannot be so soon forgetful of these statements made by me time after time in my campaign, nor can I see any reason to change my tune at this time because I am in a different environment than the one in which they were made.

In view of these statements then how can I vote for an increase of the gasoline tax, sales taxes, and other taxes to be foisted upon the backs of the already tax-burdened people of this country? How can I vote to increase the income-tax rates upon the little man whereas men like Morgan and other great rich men of this country publicly announce, while they pay income taxes in England, they pay no income tax in this country. How can I vote to modify the antitrust laws instead of making them more stringent? In view of my statements in regard to governmental economy in my campaign how can I vote to increase the bonded indebtedness of this country? How can we be consistent in taking $450,000,000 from the ex-service men and then spending $3,300,000,000 for public works we do not need and can get along without? In this connection it is proposed to spend $45,000,000 in Kansas in building a huge dam at a place called "Kiro" on the Kansas River, near Topeka.

This dam would be 2 miles long and from 60 to 100 feet high. It would create a lake flooding 106,000 acres of land. It would create a lake 40 miles long and from 4 to 6 miles wide. It would flood one of the most fertile valleys in the United States and which has been stated to be only excelled by the Nile in productivity. It would destroy 12 towns and cities. Approximately two thirds of the area flooded and more than one half of the towns destroyed would be in my congressional district. This project would have no value for Kansas but is merely to store up the flood waters of the Kansas River so that they may be fed into the Missouri River to make it navigable. The water would not be kept at any certain level and therefore would create for the most part a mudhole or a marsh. It is questionable in my mind whether it would be feasible anyway, because I do not think that the formation of the earth in this locality is such that it would retain the water, as I think there would be a great deal of seepage.

The people of this district last year voted for a change of administration as the people did all over the United States with the fond hope of bettering their condition in view of the promise of the new deal, and like the rest of the people of this country since the 4th of March have given a sigh of relief and are again going forward with a new confidence. Imagine their surprise and utter dismay to read one day last week in the daily newspapers that all their possessions and homes and everything that was near and dear to them are to be wiped out. Farmers who have farmed this land all their lives and their fathers before them were dreaming how they were going to be lifted out of their difficulties by the farm loan bill that we have passed, coupled with increasing price of products. Business men who had spent their lives in building up their businesses now view the possibility of their complete destruction. Churches, schools, and colleges that have been the pride of the inhabitants are to be destroyed, as in the great flood in the time of Noah. Cemeteries that contain the remains of the dear ones are to be obliterated, and all those places of tender memories are to be ruined. Paved highways that are the pride of the State, railroad lines of railroads connecting the Atlantic and Pacific will have to be rerouted. It might be said that the people would be compensated, but for most of these things that I have detailed there could not be any compensation that could replace them, and there would be much more destroyed in actual property than the $45,000,000 it would take to build the dam. Property that was a great taxable asset to the local community and the State will be wiped out, and in its place will be substituted Government property that will be nontaxable. Inasmuch as part of this property is under bonded indebtedness for civic improvements, great burdens will be thrown upon the remaining property and uncertainty thrown about these obligations.

People living in this community and in these cities within this project and in my district who have been planning on going forward in this new era and who are now repairing and fixing up their properties have ceased all operations and plans, knowing not which way to turn. Whereas a few contractors and a small number of men comparatively might receive employment for a short duration of time, over 20,000 of my constituents would be driven from their homes, as the Arcadians were in Evangeline; and what would be accomplished by all this? The Missouri River would not be navigable, and never will be; and if it be made navigable, it will merely be a diverting of traffic from the railroads that need it so badly. Such a project would result in an ill-advised piece of governmental extravagance which everyone opposed in the last campaign. My constituents who are to be so adversely affected are appealing to me to protect them and assist them at this time; and in this connection, Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, I wish to read two telegrams and a remonstrance petition which were sent to me by those affected.

And, in addition thereto, I am receiving scores of letters from people, many of whom are old people, and the only possessions they have are their little homes, begging and beseeching me as their Representative to protect them in this matter.

WAMEGO, KANS., May 20, 1933.

Hon. RANDOLPH CARPENTER,
House of Representatives:

Over 2,000 of the members of our community met in indignant protest here against the Kiro Dam project last evening. We urge you to do everything within your power to avert the tragedy that will exile some 20,000 people from their Kaw Valley homes. Please wire us your answer.

THE WAMEGO PROTEST COMMITTEE,
O. B. LARSON, Chairman.

WAMEGO, KANS., May 21, 1933.

Hon. RANDOLPH CARPENTER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.:

Our citizens are worked up over the Kiro Dam. Business in all lines has slowed down because our people are afraid to start improvements or deals of any kind while the uncertainty exists. Will you please use your efforts to at once block this project? We will appreciate an immediate reply.

FLOYD FUNNELL,
Mayor Wamego City.

A MODERN TRAGEDY

On the assumption that whatever benefits the majority may be done at the expense of the minority is the principle on which the proposed dam project at Kiro, Kans., is being considered. Kiro is just a small town west of Topeka, and the proposed dam, if built, will flood the Kaw Valley from Kiro west to a point just east of Manhattan, Kans.

The waters thus dammed will cover a territory from 4 to 6 miles wide and about 40 miles long. The towns of Silver Lake, St. Marys, Rossville, Kingsville, Louisville, Wamego, Belvue, and Wabaunsee will all be partly or wholly inundated with water; and hundreds of thousands of acres of the most fertile soil in the world will become but the bottom of a lake. The fact is the Kaw Valley has often been compared in fertility to that of the famous Valley of the Nile in Egypt.

This project is proposed by the administration in Washington for the purpose of flood control and navigation. The cost of the proposal has been set at $45,000,000, a sum that will not start to pay for the actual damage and cost of the proposition. It is estimated that it will furnish employment for about 15,000 men for a period of time, disregarding the fact that it will put about 10,000 folks in this district out of employment and many more than that out of their homes.

The towns affected by this dam are not large towns. They vary in size from a few hundred to around 1,500 people. But they are good, self-respecting towns—towns that have lived from a half to more than three quarters of a century; towns that owe their livelihood to the surrounding farm lands, which lands are soon to be a thing of the past. These towns will be forced to disappear or move, and if moved will have lost the source of their support.

The farms and farmers of this section are of the highest type. These fruitful acres are occupied by fine farm homes and inhabited by the class of people that compose the backbone of our American civilization. These farmers have felt the depression as hard as anyone, and yet they have worked on and "sawed wood." There have been no farm rebellions in the Kaw Valley—no strikes, no uprisings because of the farming situation. Instead, these farmers in the face of ruinous prices and heavy indebtedness have made the best of it—trusting and having faith in the future.

The folks in this affected territory are home-loving people. They are not used to the city habit of often changing flats every few months. Many of them have lived in their present homes all of their lives. They have well-kept homes with lovely yards and gardens. They are neighborly, friendly people that take pride in their prosperous little towns. Many of the business men in these towns have been in business for half a century. They have given their life's work to the establishment of their businesses. Then, too, the Union Pacific Railroad tracks, the Rock Island tracks, United States Highways Nos. 40, 10, and 11 will have to be rerouted as they lie through the proposed district.

But the Administration at Washington is fostering the proposition. The river towns of Missouri will be benefited by it. And it will be possible for barges and steamboats to take away some more freight tonnage from the railroads—the railroads, that are facing bankruptcy; the railroads, that are the backers of our insurance policies and one of the greatest tax-supporting units of our Government.

But in this country—a country established by our forefathers as a place of liberty and justice to all—the above project is being proposed. The individuals and the smaller group must give way to the larger group, in spite of the fact that the homes and farms and businesses of thousands of individuals will be destroyed and the individuals driven from their means of earning a living; in spite of the fact that several of the prettiest little towns in America will be wiped from the face of the earth. The new rural high school at St. Marys will be destroyed as well as a part of the Jesuit school buildings in the same town. Dozens of other schools and churches will be razed and done away with. The beautiful park at Wamego will be but a memory.

When the papers announced the probable outcome of the dam plan Tuesday morning, May 16, the inhabitants of the affected district were as shocked as though a terrible calamity had happened in their midst. One woman, who was varnishing the floors of her small home, quit the job and decided not to finish it. "What's the use", she said, "we'll all be moving out one of these days anyway." One 6-year-old little girl, on being told of the dam by her mother, broke down crying and said, "Mother, we haven't done anything to them, have we? God will do something to those people that are going to cover our house with water."

Of course the Government expects to pay damages for the land and property destroyed. But what amount could pay the damage done a business, backed by years of goodwill? How can these people ever be repaid for their lost towns, their wrecked gardens, and the loss of their good neighbors and homes? Money cannot buy trees that have sheltered homes and yards for decades. Nothing can ever repay folks for the separation from an old homestead.

And as the Arcadians of old, the men, women, and children of this valley will be exiled from their homelands forever. Homes will be broken, business relations ended, friends and neighbors will part.

Is it necessary that our modern American civilization demand the sacrifice of an individual part of that civilization for such a cause? Are the whims of a political party or the greed of commerce of greater importance in America than the safety and sanctity of the American farms and homes?

And while the good people of the Kaw Valley await the verdict of either acquittal or exile, their hearts are heavy and their minds are at a loss to understand why their own United States of America should wish to treat them so.

N. T. LARSON,
Wamego, Kans.

Last year we all made a campaign on governmental economy and in our Democratic platform we said:

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

We deplored the action of the Hoover administration in squandering public funds and building the $17,000,000 Commerce Building, the Hoover Dam, and all these unnecessary buildings here in Washington. At the very commencement of this administration one of our first acts was to reduce governmental expenses. Why then should we take absolutely the opposite stand from our economy platform in our recent campaign?

It is said that the purpose of this public works bill is to give employment and restore prosperity in this country; as was aptly said in the House the other day, "We cannot tax ourselves back into prosperity." When we made the promise to reduce taxes, how can we consistently increase taxes?

Three billion three hundred million dollars which is to be spent over a number of years is merely a drop in the bucket and cannot in itself restore prosperity in this country. How can prosperity in this country be restored by the Government's recklessly spending on unnecessary structures and structures that are not self-liquidating $3,300,000,000 when our national income dropped in 1 year from $90,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000. The only result will be higher taxes.

There is one way in which this proposition of public works, in my judgment, could go a long ways in restoring prosperity, and that is that these public works that are contemplated of being built should be paid for by the issuing of new currency as provided in the inflation bill that was passed as a part of the farm act recently. By paying for the projects provided for in this bill with currency we would be saving approximately one billion to the taxpayers of this country—figure it out for yourself. It is necessary by taxation to raise $220,000,000 a year for 20 years, as I understand, to pay off the interest and principal on these bonds. That would mean that it would cost the Government $4,400,000,000, whereas if we paid for this by expansion of the currency, we would only be spending $3,300,000,000, at no cost to the taxpayers, whereas by using currency, I believe, we would be not only saving a billion dollars but would be saving $4,400,000,000; but if we were to figure that we were only saving $1,100,000,000, this would be 25 percent of the project and in keeping with our platform pledges to reduce governmental expenses by 25 percent instead of increasing governmental expenses by 25 percent. With the provision of so paying for these public works that are really necessary in this country, it gives us an expansion of currency that would materially assist in reestablishing prosperity. The issuing of tax-exempt bonds will take that much more money away from the source of local taxation. However, in my judgment, prosperity is going to be restored in this country in spite of this bill; it is going to be restored in the same manner and in the same method in which the depression was created; confidence has been restored, and we are going to talk ourselves back into prosperity the same as fear caused us to talk ourselves into the depression.

And in conclusion in regard to this matter let me make this statement—that I have witnessed almost every day since I have been in Congress, Members being lined up, put on the spot, and forced to vote against their campaign promises and their best judgment. In my campaign I made certain promises to my constituents; if I thought my position then taken was wrong and not for the best interests of the people of my district, I should be glad to change my position and correct the same; but when I know my position was right then, and is right now, I cannot in honesty and justice change my position and go back on every promise that I made to my people only a few days ago.

The farmers of this country were denied the privilege of fixing their prices when the Simpson-cost-of-production amendment was turned down in this House a couple weeks ago, yet under title I—the first part of this bill, that has no relation to the public works part of the bill—monopolies and trusts are permitted to increase and fix the price of products they expect to sell to the farmer.

There is another feature of this proposed bill—which under the rule cannot be amended except by the Ways and Means Committee—that may lead to a dictatorship over all the industries of this country and which could result in disadvantage to the little man and the little industry through favoritism of this system to the more powerful. Serious doubt has arisen as to the constitutionality of such an act. And if because of the present so-called "emergency" the Supreme Court should hold this act as constitutional, such decision in itself might result in what would amount to an abandonment of the Constitution. This old Constitution has carried us through all the storms of the past into seas of prosperity, has made us the greatest Nation and people in the history of civilization. The storm of the Civil War that it withstood was worse than the present storm. It stood by us then and will stand by and carry us through the present storm. Then in our hysteria of the present hour we should not abandon it, for if we do not, one can foretell the future; let us stay by it and ride the storm out to prosperity and a better day.

Regardless of what course others may take, I only know one way to play politics, and that is to as nearly as possible keep my campaign promises.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma to address the House for 2 minutes?

There was no objection.

RULES AFFECTING DISABLED WAR VETERANS MUST BE MODIFIED

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, for the past several weeks I have been doing everything within my power to point out the injustices proposed to be done to thousands of disabled war veterans throughout the country by the Director of the Budget and the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, who are administering that part of the Economy Act affecting war veterans.

On May 5 I spoke on this subject at some length on this floor in connection with my House Concurrent Resolution No. 17. Since that time I have received hundreds of letters from disabled war veterans, many of whom have been disabled for several years and whose disabilities are service connected, advising me that they have been notified by the Regional Office at Oklahoma City that their compensation would be cut entirely off or materially reduced June 30.

I desire at this time to enter another protest against the heartless, cruel, cold-blooded, and unreasonable manner in which those officials in charge of administering the veterans' laws propose to deal with our helpless and disabled war veterans. I could give this House dozens of instances of injustices that are proposed to be made in connection with veterans whom I know personally, but I shall not do so at this time. As one who reluctantly voted for the Economy Act because of assurances given me by those in whom I had the utmost confidence, and because of my sincere desire to stand by our great President, I say here and now that I shall insist that this House remain in session until Christmas, if need be, in order to correct the wrong that is evidently about to be done to many of our disabled war veterans unless drastic action is taken before June 30. [Applause.]

Time does not permit me to include all the resolutions I have received in connection with this matter so near and dear to the hearts of the war veterans and their families, but I am submitting herewith one resolution unanimously passed by El Reno Post, No. 34, one of the largest American Legion Posts in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Whom did you say these resolutions are from?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. From an American Legion Post at El Reno, Okla.

Mr. McFADDEN. To what do they pertain?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. To proposed changes in the rules and regulations and instructions with respect to the administration of the Economy Act by the Director of the Budget and the Veterans' Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Let me add that the suggestions herein made concerning the needed changes in the administration of this law occur to me to be reasonable, just, and fair, and I sincerely trust they will be given every possible consideration by those in authority at an early date.

EL RENO, OKLA.

Resolutions

Whereas the economy program of the national administration is receiving the hearty endorsement of the American Legion in practically every phase, as an emergency movement to save the Nation from its threatened financial collapse; and

Whereas the veterans are willingly accepting reductions in many places which have imposed real hardships upon them, all in a spirit of patriotism of the same type which prompted them to make unlimited sacrifices at the time the Nation was in the war emergency; but

Whereas the application of the new compensation-reduction program applies to those veterans who are physically handicapped in such a way that they are unable to provide for the proper maintenance of themselves and families; and

Whereas a humanitarian view of the situation demands that these men who have rendered service to their Nation which cannot be compensated by money, be given every possible aid and comfort by those who are not so handicapped: Be it hereby

Resolved by El Reno Post, No. 34, American Legion, Department of Oklahoma, That we endorse the program of the national executive committee of the American Legion which provides for the following revisions in the announced application of the emergency measures and urgently request our Congressmen and Senators to actively cooperate and aggressively assist the American Legion in its program:

1. Continuing on compensation rolls all service-connected cases of veterans, which were properly granted under laws in existence immediately prior to the Economy Act.

2. A change in the present regulations relating to hospitalization and domiciliary care in Government institutions for non-service-connected disablements.

3. Rectification of money payments to veterans suffering from service-incurred disabilities to more equitable levels.

4. A liberalization of some of the present unduly restrictive burial provisions; be it further

Resolved, That El Reno Post, No. 34, oppose to the utmost the unfair cuts, in many cases as high as 60 percent, in service-connected compensation, and urgently demand that in the event definite proof of service-connected disabilities is lacking and yet there is a strong presumption that their origin was due to the rigors of service, that the veterans be given the benefit of the doubt.

Passed and approved this 16th day of May 1933.

By order of the executive committee.

W. NELSON HANCOCK,
Commander.
J. CHARLES BURGER,
Adjutant.
GUY C. KNARR,
Service Officer.
J. B. KELLY,
Finance Officer.
J. A. WHEATLEY,
First Vice Commander.
ROBT. E. MARK,
Second Vice Commander.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MURPHY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] on account of a temporary indisposition. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KENDRICK. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. LUCE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5661) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. LUCE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass House Joint Resolution 155, by Congressman O'MALLEY, authorizing Congress to conscript property as well as persons in time of war

Whereas Congressman THOMAS O'MALLEY, of this State, has introduced House Joint Resolution No. 155, which proposes to amend the Constitution of the United States to authorize Congress, in time of war, to conscript both persons and property, but permitting Congress to conscript persons only if at the same time it also conscripts property; and

Whereas in past wars, while persons have been conscripted, property has never been subject to conscription, and the Constitution as it now stands does not permit property to be taken even in war time without full compensation and in accordance with due process of law; and

Whereas this discrimination between persons and property is not only grossly unjust but is one of the principal causes of war, since men of wealth and influence will be much more hesitant to involve the country in war if they know that their property may be taken without compensation, just as the lives of their less fortunate fellow citizens may be taken: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to adopt House Joint Resolution 155, proposing to the States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States granting power to the Congress in time of war to take property for military and nonmilitary purposes without payment of profit when conscripting persons for military or nonmilitary purposes; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which was ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Edward J. Hughes, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of House Joint Resolution No. 58, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois.

Done at the city of Springfield this 24th day of May A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] EDWARD J. HUGHES,
Secretary of State.

House Joint Resolution 58

Whereas the United States Senate has now before it the independent offices appropriation bill, one of the items therein being the amount of the budget of the Veterans' Administration; and

Whereas Public Act No. 2, section 6, provides that care and treatment may be furnished veterans of any war for neuropsychiatric ailments, thereby assuming the care of totally disabled veterans suffering from mental diseases as a Federal responsibility; and

Whereas since the ending of the World War, due to an insufficient number of beds available for the care and treatment of mentally disabled within Federal hospitals, Illinois State facilities have been utilized under contract with the Veterans' Administration at a cost much less than the operating cost of the same comparable Federal beds, and as a result of which the State of Illinois has received from one hundred fifty to two hundred thousand dollars annually; and

Whereas there are now being cared for in Illinois State institutions 1,050 mentally disabled veterans committed by the various county courts, and instructions issued by the Veterans' Administration indicate existing contracts will cease July 1, and the future care of these veterans will become a responsibility of the taxpayers of the State of Illinois; and, further, there are thousands of mentally disabled veterans in Illinois not confined in any institution whose only means of livelihood for the most part will also be taken away and the balance greatly reduced, which will obviously cause a great number of new commitments, thereby forcing the State of Illinois to appropriate $400,000 or more for the biennium to meet the cost of care which these unfortunate veterans deserve, or to refuse such care: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the senate concurring herein), That we memorialize the Congress of the United States to include in the independent offices appropriation bill such measures and appropriations as will permit the continuation of contracts to meet this emergency; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be immediately forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each Member of the Congress from the State of Illinois.

Adopted by the house May 16, 1933.

ARTHUR ROE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CHAS. P. CASEY,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Concurred in by the senate May 16, 1933.

THOMAS F. DONOVAN,
President of the Senate.
A. E. EDEN,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a special committee of the American Machinery and Tools Institute, Chicago, Ill., approving and endorsing Senate bill 1712, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from R. F. Schoolfield, oil producer, and sundry other citizens engaged in the oil industry, of San Antonio, Tex., favoring the inclusion of pipe-line divorcement in the proposed plan for Federal control of the oil business, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, New York City, N.Y., favoring the passage of legislation to invest the President with full authority to negotiate and conclude reciprocal tariff agreements with foreign nations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Commissioners Court of Lynn County, Tex., endorsing the program of President Roosevelt and favoring the inauguration as an unemployment relief measure of a highway-construction program in the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the National Society United States Daughters of 1812, State of Illinois, protesting against recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate two petitions of sundry citizens of Hammond and Natchitoches, in the State of Louisiana, praying for a senatorial investigation relative to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—PETITION OF WIDOWS OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE NAVY WHO PERISHED IN "AKRON" DISASTER

On motion of Mr. TRAMMELL, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the widows of officers and enlisted men of the Navy who lost their lives in the wreck of the U.S.S. Akron and the U.S.S. J–3 on April 4, 1933, praying for the passage of legislation restoring in their case the double pension which widows of flight officers and men were entitled to receive prior to the passage of the so-called "Economy Act", and the petition was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 1738) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to irrigation districts for certain purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 98) thereon.

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 696) to authorize Frank W. Mahin, retired American Foreign Service officer, to accept from Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands the brevet and insignia of the Royal Netherland Order of Orange Nassau, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 56) to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 99) thereon.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 30) authorizing the Committee on Foreign Relations to hold hearings during the Seventy-third Congress, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 73) authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to provide for the preservation of old documents on file in the Senate Library, reported it with an amendment.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on May 25, 1933, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 753) to confer the degree of bachelor of science upon graduates of the Naval, the Military, and the Coast Guard Academies.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 1787) to provide for the prevention of blindness in infants born in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 1788) to amend section 36, part 4, of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 1789) granting a pension to Mary D. Howard (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAYDEN:

A bill (S. 1790) to amend the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 475, 476), commonly called the San Carlos Act, and acts supplementary thereto, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. OVERTON:

A bill (S. 1791) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to levee districts for certain purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 1792) for the relief of Claude C. Martin; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana:

A bill (S. 1793) for the relief of James W. Emison; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ADAMS:

A bill (S. 1794) to authorize Vernon C. DeVotie, captain, United States Army, to accept a certain decoration tendered to him by the Colombian Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BLACK:

A bill (S. 1795) to amend the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, with respect to suits on contracts on yearly renewable term insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H.R. 4812. An act to promote the foreign trade of the United States in apples and/or pears, to protect the reputation of American-grown apples and pears in foreign markets, to prevent deception or misrepresentation as to the quality of such products moving in foreign commerce, to provide for the commercial inspection of such products entering such commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

H.R. 5755. An act to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. BARBOUR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1712, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE NEAR OGDENSBURG, N.Y.—AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 5329) creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REDUCTION OF VETERANS' COMPENSATION—SUICIDE OF DISABLED VETERAN

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I merely desire to ask for time enough to read the following telegram from Castle Point, N.Y.:

CASTLE POINT, N.Y., May 26, 1933.

Senator ARTHUR ROBINSON,
Washington, D.C.:

Harry Davies, disabled veteran, father of four small children, hung himself at this hospital. New Economy Act responsible for this suicide: worry about destitution which faces his family upon loss of compensation more than he could bear. Although Davies first actual suicide here, this added burden of worry retarding cure and hastening the deaths of many tubercular veterans.

DISABLED VETERANS.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] desires to discuss the pending bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire to discuss some features of the bill and some features of the railroad transportation question this morning from a little different angle than they have been discussed heretofore. We are told that the purpose of the pending measure is to help the railroads. I, for one, want to help the railroads. They are an important part of our economic life and the most important part of our domestic transportation system on land. The hue and cry that has been raised about helping the railroads is undoubtedly due to the fact that the railroads are in trouble.

A great deal has been written in the press and said on the platform about the "dire condition", "the deplorable condition", of the railroads, and, in view of that fact, I think it important to learn, if we can, what in reality is the matter with the railroads; what is their important trouble. If we are to help them out of trouble let us find out, if we can, what brought them into trouble; what is the cause of their difficulty; what is the best way to help them; and can be help them in such a way as will not continue the so-called or labeled "policy or policies" we have pursued in recent years having for their purpose helping all industry as well as the railroads. In short, where do we go from here? These policies, in my opinion, have been detrimental to the whole Nation, because the help has been of an artificial character; it has been piecemeal; it has added to the burdens of industry, added to the burdens of transportation, and has, in my judgment, had a great deal to do with bringing the country where it is today. We have helped industry and transportation in such a way that we have arrived at a condition where the whole economic life of the Nation is threatened, if not the Government itself.

What I have to say I want to assure the Senate I do not say with any intention of casting any reflection upon the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate that reported this bill nor upon the authors of the bill, whoever they may be, for we do not know who its authors are. I want to discuss the facts of the railroad situation as they appear to me.

The purpose of the bill is stated to be helpful to the railroads in making it possible for them to make savings. It has been stated that under this bill the savings will be effectuated at the expense of labor. That contention has been denied; it has been argued that it is not the intention to make savings at the expense of labor.

The Senate yesterday adopted some good amendments to the bill for the protection of labor. These amendments we were told were adopted for the purpose of seeing to it that whatever savings are made shall not be made at the expense of labor. This morning I find quoted on that subject in Labor, the railroad labor-organization paper, a very well-edited paper, a statement by Robert B. Fletcher, general counsel for the Association of Railway Presidents, to the effect that he appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House on Monday and flatly declared that if the amendments proposed to be inserted by the Senate committee were adopted the bill might as well not be passed. Evidently Mr. Fletcher, speaking for the railroad presidents' organization, believes there will be no saving from the bill if the amendments for the protection of labor adopted yesterday shall remain in the bill.

Mr. Fletcher ought to know what is the purpose of the bill. Mr. Fletcher ought to know whether the savings to be accomplished are to be taken out of labor. He evidently believes that they were to be taken out of labor, because he said if the amendments for the protection of labor remained in the bill the bill might as well not be passed.

I want to discuss some other features of the bill this morning. There are particularly two features other than the labor provision. One which I think is very important is the provision which changes the basis for rate making. Before I go into that discussion I want to invite the attention of the Senate to a chart which I have had placed on the wall. The chart was prepared for me by an expert who has obtained information after a year's labor, himself digging the information out of documents of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In order to clarify what I may say later I want to call attention to the chart.

The chart sets forth the total mileage of railroads for various years. It shows the capital structure as of the date of valuation for that period ending in 1918 to be approximately $20,000,000,000 in round numbers which does not take into consideration approximately one third billion dollars in floating indebtedness. Since that time the capital structure has had added to it $4,151,000,000, making a total capital structure of $24,523,000,000 in round numbers. That is the total capital structure of the railroad plant in the United States, the total of bonds and stocks outstanding. The market value in the last 3 years for that plant, as reflected in the value of the stocks and bonds on the stock exchange, has varied from $6,000,000,000 to $9,000,000,000.

The chart discloses the total from rail operations. Some Senators have asked me what the number shown on the chart is intended to indicate. That is to illustrate the law of diminishing returns when the railroads charge more than the traffic will bear and which appeared in 1928 when the returns started to go down.

I invite attention to the steady interest income on the bonded indebtedness. We have the net revenue from rail operations shown at one place on the chart and in another place we have for comparison the wholesale commodity price index.

I want to talk about the capital structure. To those Senators who were not in the Chamber when I began let me say that the total capital structure as of date of the end of the period of valuation has now increased to about $24,500,000,000.

The cost of reproduction new of this plant as given in the documents of the Interstate Commerce Commission at the time of valuation was $14,875,000,000. The difference between $14,875,000,000 in round numbers and $20,000,000,000, the then capitalization, represents the difference in capital structure and the cost of production new, a difference of over $5,000,000,000. This was the over capitalization at time of valuation. The cost of reproduction new less depreciation at time of valuation is given as $11,873,322,000. The final value for rate-making purposes as of date of valuation is given as $15,000,000,000 in round numbers. So we find that the Interstate Commerce Commission has valued the railroads for the purpose of ratemaking at $5,000,000,000 less than the then capital structure calling for interest and dividends. Since valuation over $4,000,000,000 has been added to the capitalization which has been invested in betterments equipment, most of which represents unnecessary duplication.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I am interested in the figures the Senator is giving because they are so out of line with the figures which were given to the committee by Commissioner Eastman. Will the Senator state again the cost figures?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. These figures were obtained for me by one of the best traffic experts in the United States who worked for more than a year on the documents of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He told me that in his opinion there are facts in the documents and files of the Commission of which the Commissioners themselves were apparently not aware.

Mr. WHITE. May I interrupt further simply to repeat that the figures are quite out of line with those given the committee by Commissioner Eastman. I do not know which is correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am glad the Senator interrupted in the way of giving that information, because I had been told by another Senator that there was a variance between the figures which I have and those given by Commissioner Eastman.

Mr. WHITE. I do not presume to say which is correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Nor do I, but I have faith in these. I have here a table in detail of the capital structure of every railroad in the United States, copied by an expert from the documents in the possession of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This table gives the citations from official reports, so the Senator can check one against the other. Later I shall ask to have it printed in the RECORD in full for the information of the Senate and for the information of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the debate yesterday the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] was asked if the bill has anything to do with reduction of capital structure. That is a very important question. If I remember correctly, the Senator from Washington said it has not, that it does not affect capital structure. He was then asked if, in his opinion, it is not important and necessary that the capital structure should be written down. He said the only provision made for a reorganization is, in case a railroad company comes to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and asks for a loan, that under the provisions of the bill the Corporation should not loan any money to a railroad company if, in the opinion of the Commission, the railroad company needs in the public interest a reorganization of its capital structure. I think that is important, because the history of the reorganization of railroad corporations and also of the capital structure under the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission does not give us very much hope of any write-down in the capital structure.

From the record we get little hope of better results in the future so far as the Commission is concerned.

Another portion of the chart represents the stocks and bonds that have been issued so far back as we have any record, back to 1911. The valuation for rate-making purposes covered the period from 1914 to 1919. I do not know why 1911 was taken as the beginning. We have shown on the chart the stocks and bonds represented by the issues that have been made since the beginning of the records we have.

At another place on the chart are shown the bond issues. If there is any bond issue that has ever been made in the past 40 or 50 years that has at any time made any provision for amortization, I do not know what issue it was. Bond issue after bond issue has been made, one on top of the other. I have in mind a bond issue of nearly $50,000,000, coming due within 60 days, issued 40 years ago, and not 1 cent has been amortized.

I am informed by railroad men that in the various yards of the United States are mile after mile of obsolete locomotives that cannot be destroyed because of the law against destruction of mortgaged property. They are no good. They were bought a long time ago. They cannot be used but cannot be destroyed because they are included in these mortgages upon which the public are asked to pay interest, collected through freight rates.

In this capital burden we have all the cost of reorganizations, all of the bankers' commissions, all of the land grants, all of the gifts ever received by the railroads. We have here still the notes and the mortgages given for money loaned to be paid for box cars 30, 40, or 50 years ago, never written off. We have here the bonds and mortgages that were issued for the rebuilding of right of way, for ties and rails when bonds were given to pay for them, not amortized. They are all here.

Up until the date of valuation, aids, gifts, grants, and donations to class 1 railroads amounted to $956,383,000, in round numbers. That is nearly a billion dollars in gifts. Since that time, 14,000,000 acres of land have been patented to the railroads. That is all in this capital structure.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator going to try to put that map in the RECORD? Otherwise, the RECORD is not going to disclose what the Senator has reference to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am going to ask to have it inserted in the RECORD, because, without that illustration, it possibly would be hard to understand what I have said.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see how it would be clear without it.

(For illustration, see p. 4409.)

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Now, we come to reorganization.

When railroads are in trouble they go into bankruptcy or into the hands of a receiver. What has been the result of that? As a result of these reorganizations of railroad corporations up to date of valuation, their stock and bond obligations have been increased by $270,718,594; so reorganization has not resulted in writing down the burden of debt. Instead, it has increased the burden of debt, and that is all in this total of capital structure.

Discounts or bonuses from sales of stocks and bonds of existing corporations up to date of valuation amount to $343,871,368.

Discounts or bonuses from sales of stocks or bonds of predecessor corporations up to date of valuation amounted to $434,194,190.

Next, the chart shows the receivers and reorganizations that have taken place prior to the date of valuation. The cost of reorganizations by receivers amounted to $100,148,262, making a total cost of reorganization, a total increase of the mortgage debt of $1,148,932,414.

So the history of reorganization of railroads under the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and prior thereto, shows that it has not resulted in reducing the burden of debt, but, on the other hand, has resulted in an increase in debt of over $1,100,000,000.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

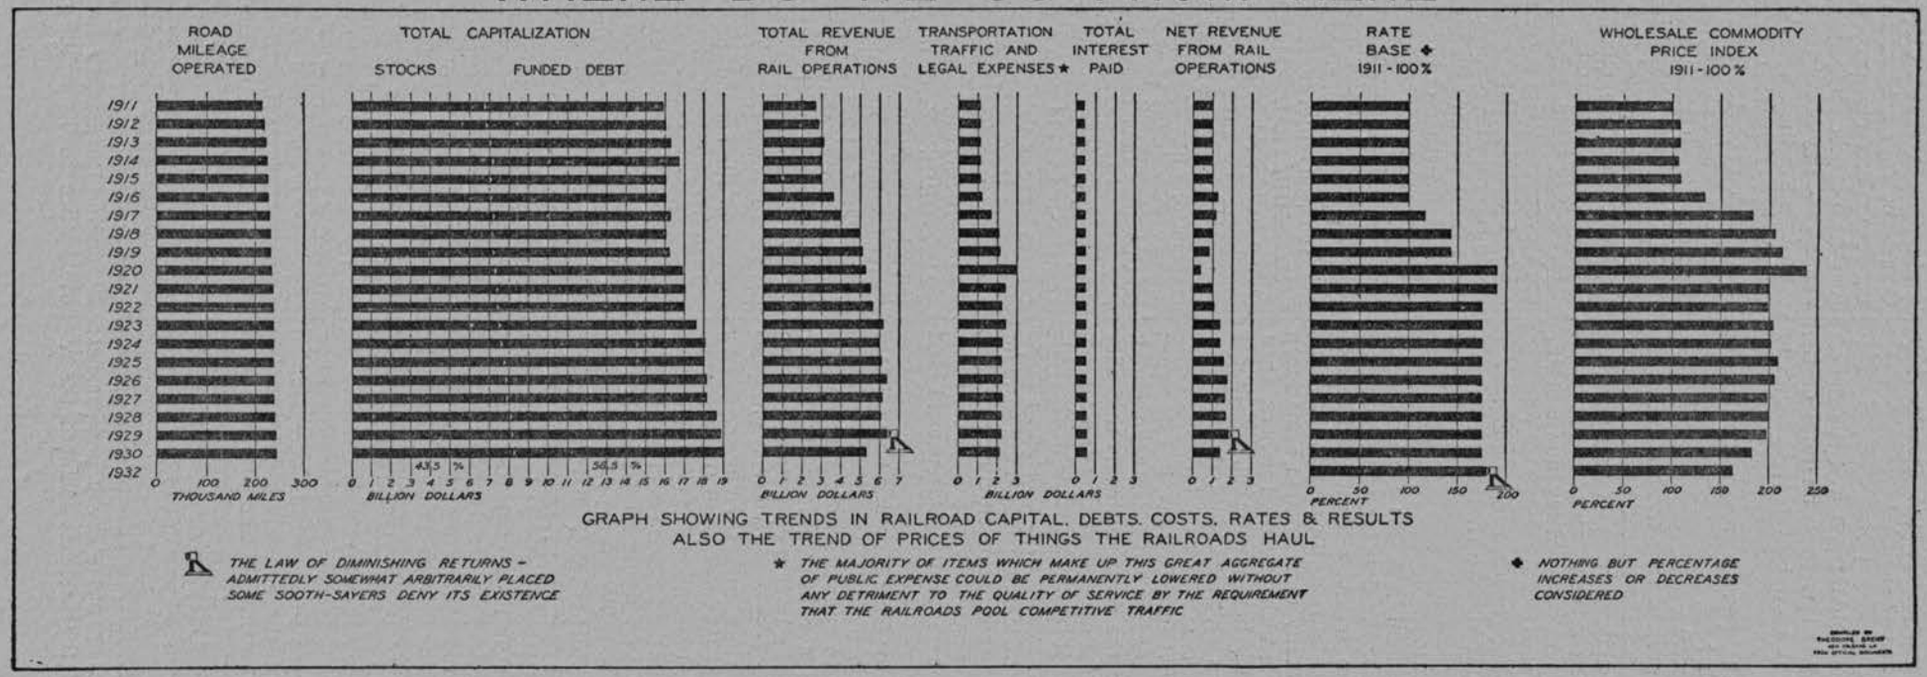
Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Is the Senator familiar with the reorganization proceedings in the case of the Milwaukee Railway Co. a few years ago?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I was very much interested at the time. I do not remember all of the details.

Mr. BONE. As I recall, they wrote out, washed out, or squeezed out all the stockholders. The road was reorganized. I was wondering if the Senator had any figures showing the present capitalization of the road, and whether there is anything in the record to indicate that they had reduced the capital structure by that drastic process which froze out all the stockholders?

Mr. BONE. I quite agree with the Senator that these reorganizations do not result in a write-down of the capital structure. The public still continues to pay on all this dwindled water that the roads had written into their capital structure.



Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, yes.

Rather than go into the details here, I will state to the Senator that I have the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific, with its new capital structure, in these figures. I am going to put all of them in the RECORD, because I think any Senator or the Interstate Commerce Commission is entitled to have them for the purpose of checking up on these figures. The details of the Milwaukee reorganization I do not now remember. The charge was made at the time that it was unnecessary; that they needed for the moment a small sum of money; and a certain banking house—I think it was Kuhn, Loeb & Co.—furnished it, or promised it; but, instead of delivering it, they threw the road into the hands of a receiver, and the stockholders claimed they were defrauded, and a new issue of debentures and bonds of two or three different classes was floated.

Mr. BONE. My reason for asking the question was that when these men had an opportunity to write down the capital structure and reorganize the road on some reasonable financial basis, instead of doing that they proceeded again to inject into the whole structure a new flood of wind and water in the form of stock of one kind or another, and a new flotation of bonds. In other words, under private ownership of these utilities there is no possibility of getting them to do anything reasonable. That was the purpose of my question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am glad the Senator stated what he did, because I had intended to state the same thing later.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator goes further, may I ask him a question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I followed the figures presented by the Senator. What is the sum total of the railroad indebtedness of the United States at the present time?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator mean the bonded debt alone or bonds and stocks?

Mr. BORAH. Bonds and stocks.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. At the present time the total of bonds and stocks of the railroads is $24,523,816,836.

Mr. BORAH. From the Senator's study of this question, does he see any way of getting a reduction of freight rates except through a reorganization and writing down of the capital structure of the railroads?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not see how it can be done.

Mr. BORAH. Does this bill deal with that subject in any way?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Not at all.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Instead of setting aside a fund for the purpose of meeting these obligations, as the Senator has said, what the railroads have actually done was to set aside a surplus at times; and then, when they wanted to boost their stocks upon the stock market, they have taken the money out of the surplus and paid dividends out of it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is true.

Mr. WHEELER. As I pointed out yesterday, in 1930, when as a matter of fact the railroads had a deficit, they took out of their surplus and kept up the same dividends that they had been paying in 1928 and 1929. So during those boom times, to keep up the price of their stocks, some of the railroads actually took out of their surplus a sufficient sum to enable them to increase their dividends, solely, I am sure, for the purpose of increasing the speculation in their stocks at that time. Then, of course, when they had depleted their treasuries, they came back here to the Government and asked for more money.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator from Montana think that if the railroads over the years had used the surplus earnings they had been accumulating to amortize their funded debt, and had actually amortized a considerable part of their funded debt, the gentlemen who have been putting over all of this stuff that the Senator is discussing would not have immediately substituted for those amortized bonds a new flotation of stock and other forms of security that the railroad companies are so fond of issuing? They would have merely substituted for the amortized funded debt a new form of stock issues of some sort; they would have sold them to the public, and we would not have been any better off.

Mr. WHEELER. They would have done it if it had not been prohibited and stopped by law; but it seems to me that the Congress of the United States, which has had charge of the railroads, has been derelict in its duty, in that it did not make the railroads set aside in their good years a certain amount of money for the purpose of paying off these bonds and prohibit them from issuing new securities. Then the railroads of the country would have been in very much better shape than they are at the present time, and would have been able to give better service and lower freight rates.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, under the recapture clause the railroads were allowed to earn up to 6 percent. Of the earnings above that, 50 percent was to come to the Government and 50 percent was to go to the roads. Our committee was informed that the Government's part in the bookkeeping process was $300,000,000. That is what we are asked to remit to the railroads in this bill.

If it be true that the Government's part is $300,000,000, the railroads' share was $300,000,000 above 6 percent net; so that since the passage of the act that included the recapture clause the railroads, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, have earned $600,000,000 above a net return of 6 percent. That, of course, could not be used for the purpose of paying dividends, but must be kept against the day of settlement.

So we have the spectacle that during all this period since the passage of the Esch-Cummins Act, the roads have earned, above 6 percent, the sum of $600,000,000—$300,000,000 for themselves and $300,000,000 for the Government. Therefore it seems that if there had been a provision in the law by which they would have had to amortize these outstanding obligations, they could in a period of years have so reduced the burden on the public that they could today run without the assistance of anyone.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, can the Senator tell us why the Government has not claimed the $300,000,000?

Mr. SMITH. That would take perhaps all the time we would have until adjournment. The matter is in litigation, and I think perhaps the question is to be taken to the courts to decide whether or not the provision is a legal one. The point I want to make, however, if the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me, is that according to the bookkeeping of the Interstate Commerce Commission, there has been earned by the roads, since the passage of the Esch-Cummins Act, $600,000,000 in excess of 6 percent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, from 1911 to 1930 the public have paid in interest and dividends, through freight and passenger rates, to this railroad plant on this capital structure a total of $16,339,000,000. That, in round numbers, is something like $2,000,000,000 more than the cost of reproduction new of the railroad plant at the time of valuation. So that they have more than paid, in dividends and interest, the value of the plant in 20 years, and how many times they have paid for it in the preceding 20 or 40 years we do not know; but the old plants that are worn out and have been replaced are still in this capital structure and we are still paying for them after they have been paid for several times.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. This discussion, and particularly the contribution made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], reminds me that it seems to me it ought to be plain to everybody who is trying to have the railroads operated on a business basis that when they accumulate, if they do, by rates on freight and passengers, a surplus above a reasonable compensation in the way of dividends, instead of capitalizing that surplus the surplus ought to be applied to the reduction of the bonded indebtedness of the railroads.

In other words, if the roads continue to make a profit above a reasonable and legal allowance, it would eventually wipe out the indebtedness and the people would get the benefit of lower rates as that indebtedness decreased, and no harm would come to the railroads, but they would always be in a more prosperous condition. In a time of depression like this they would not be called upon to charge rates sufficient to pay income on an indebtedness which has, as a matter of fact, to a great extent been contributed by the people of the country in excess rates they have paid.

I would like to call attention to one case, and I speak from memory; I may be wrong as to the exact figures, but it will illustrate the point definitely. The Burlington Railroad, one of the best railroads in the United States and one of the best financial investments of the United States, through a long term of years had on hand a surplus amounting to $60,000,000, as I remember it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. They applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the right to issue stock for that $60,000,000. During all the time they had been accumulating that $60,000,000, they had been receiving in all instances, in every year, more than a reasonable amount for dividends. I think it was 22 or 22½ percent they paid in dividends on the Burlington Road at the time the Government took the road over, when that was the percentage we had to guarantee while we had possession of the road. They never paid less than 8 percent, I believe.

The question arises, who contributed that $60,000,000? It was the people of the country who had patronized the road, either as passengers or as men who shipped freight over the road. They paid that much more than they ought to have paid, assuming that the railroads should get only a reasonable return. During all that time they got, I think, much more than a reasonable return.

Technically speaking, under our law, it was held that that $60,000,000 belonged to the railroad, and hence they were allowed to issue stock on $60,000,000, not a penny of which belonged in reality or good morals to them, but it belonged to the people who had patronized the railroad.

If this excess charge which resulted in the accumulation of that $60,000,000 had been applied to the reduction of the debt, as any ordinary business corporation would apply it in the operation of the institution, it would have made it possible for rates to be reduced. Instead of taking that course, however, they were allowed to issue $60,000,000 worth of stock, and hence the result of it all was that the people who contributed that excess were themselves burdened for all time by being compelled to pay a return on that amount in the way of dividends.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator brought up the question of the Burlington Road, one of the finest properties in the United States. I want to give the Senate a statement as to the capital structure of the Burlington Road, and when I give it to Senators they will easily understand why that road had such a large surplus. It also has something to do with a road that is properly capitalized. What is the value for rate-making purposes?

We must bear in mind that the Burlington Road is owned by the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern, a very valuable property. The value for rate-making purposes is $499,000,000. When we compare that with the stock and bond issues we find they have a very low capital structure, a very low bond and stock structure, as compared with other roads. They had bonds outstanding at the time of valuation of only $176,000,000, in round numbers, and stock outstanding of $111,739,000, in round numbers. So it will be seen they had a value for rate-making purposes of about two hundred million more than the total capital stock and bonds. Therefore, on the basis of rates charged on that valuation, of course, they would make a very fine return on that low capital. That is one reason why I think there is something wrong with our method of valuation.

This recapture clause, about which the Senator from South Carolina spoke, specifying $600,000,000 over and above 6 percent, as I remember, was a sweetening coat that was given to the Esch-Cummins law when it passed Congress. Congress was told, "This is a good law, because we will have the big roads help the little roads and the poor roads", and they were allowed to collect with the understanding that that fund, over and above what they could make under the law, should be apportioned out among the weaker roads. I understand that very little has been paid out. It is held by these corporations to the amount of $300,000,000, I believe the Senator said, and under the pending bill it is proposed that shall be paid back to the strong roads which collected it.

I am sorry the Senator from Idaho is not here now. He brought up the question of the reduction of rates under the pending bill. I said I could not see where there was any opportunity to reduce rates under the bill. On the other hand, I believe there is a very good foundation in this bill for raising rates, because it changes the basis of rate making.

Under the Transportation Act rates were to be fixed on what was found to be the fair value of a railroad. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court that was changed from the fair value for rate-making purposes established by the Interstate Commerce Commission to what the Court said should be the basis for rate making—cost of reproduction new. The cost of reproduction new is an entirely different matter from what it was during the inflation period, from 1916 to 1918, or from 1918 up until 1929.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield for a correction?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator's statement is a little too broad. The Supreme Court did not say that the basis should be the cost of reproduction new. It said that that was one of the factors, one of the important factors, that should be taken into consideration.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I possibly laid too much stress on that, and I hope Senators will excuse me for doing so. I do not want to overstate anything I think to be a fact; but when we take into consideration the background of what the Court said at that time, and what they said subsequently, I think we are justified in saying that that is the rule.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I would like to ask the Senator from Montana, and the question is directed also to the Senator from Minnesota, whether it is not a fact that in the McCardle case, arising in the State of Indiana, the Supreme Court did not virtually adopt, almost in toto, the doctrine of reproduction cost new in establishing the value of the utility involved in that case? In other words, when these cases were adjudicated in the Supreme Court, they went back to the local bodies for determination, and they practically applied the doctrine of reproduction cost new.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The O'Fallon case was not the last word of the Court on the subject. The first word came in the Indianapolis Water Rate case, and as long as this has been brought up, I am going to say a word about that case.

Mr. BONE. The Senator means the McCardle case?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am now talking about the Indianapolis Water Rate case, where the first rule was laid down by the Supreme Court, through Justice Butler, as to the basis for valuation for rate making.

Mr. BONE. That was the case of McCardle against The Indianapolis Water Co.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That was the first one. In that case the Supreme Court overruled the State utilities commission—I think it was called—which had valued the property for the purpose of making a rate, and the company appealed to the Supreme Court for redress, saying that their property was confiscated without due process of law. The Court rendered a decision overturning the findings of the commission and wrote the rule that cost of reproduction new had to be the basis of valuation for rate making.

Justice Butler wrote the opinion in that case. I do not want to cast any reflection on Justice Butler, who has had a very distinguished career as a lawyer and on the Supreme Court Bench, but when Justice Butler was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1922—and I say this without questioning his integrity or his honesty or his ability; I have the highest regard for his ability—I had not taken my seat in the Senate, but I came down to protest against his confirmation, on the ground that for years he had been the chief counsel for the railway executives in their actions before the Interstate Commerce Commission on the question of valuation, and Justice Butler was the originator, to the best of my knowledge, of the theory of the cost of reproduction new. I well remember coming as a tenderfoot—and I still am—to the Senate and to the Judiciary Committee to be heard.

The three distinguished Senators on the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary were Senator Knute Nelson, Senator Cummins, and Senator Walsh of Montana, all three now dead. As a result of my objection, they all agreed that Justice Butler would be disqualified from sitting in a case affecting the valuation of railroads when the Supreme Court should finally decide that question. Of course, if that were true, that was no reason, standing alone, why the Senate should fail to confirm him. But the first case involving valuation for rate-making purposes was the Indianapolis

Water Rate case, and the decision was written by Justice Butler, and the rule was fixed in that case, as we found later in the O'Fallon case, when the Interstate Commerce Commission, on the valuation of a railroad, came into Court.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an interpolation just there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Just before Mr. Justice Butler came on that Court they had had the Galveston Rate case, and, I think, the case of the Georgia & Carrollton Railroad, from Georgia. Just before Justice Butler took his seat they had reaffirmed the doctrine, in the Smythe against Ames case, that all of these items were to be taken into consideration, and had refused to adopt the dominant reproduction-cost theory. Mr. Butler, then the proponent of this logic, was put on that Bench following those two decisions, which had been the law for many, many years. He was deliberately put on that Bench, and sat there and wrote the opinion in the Indianapolis Water Works case, turning over the previous decisions for something he had been advocating before that Court all the time, and everybody knew it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in discussing Mr. Butler's appointment without the consent of the Senator, but I was a member of the Judiciary Committee when that appointment was made. I was not a member of the subcommittee. If the Senator will remember, when he came down here, as he says, a "tenderfoot", before he had been sworn in as a Senator, although he had been elected, the short session of that Congress then being under way, he came to see me about it. I think he will remember when I remind him that I was the member of the Judiciary Committee who arranged for the hearing and for the Senator to be heard before the subcommittee. There was quite a contest over that case, and, if the Senator will permit me, without having any reference to any individual, I want to discuss it from the standpoint of the principle involved.

Here was a man appointed to the Supreme Court. His nomination was referred by the Senate to the Judiciary Committee. The Senator has told the Senate who the chairman of the Judiciary Committee was and who composed the subcommittee. Both the chairman and the members of the subcommittee have now passed away, but I shall never forget the discussion that took place, both in the committee and on the floor of the Senate. The proceedings in executive session at that time were held behind closed doors, and so there is no record of the debate; the public was not allowed to hear what went on in this Chamber when the report on that nomination came before the Senate. However, it was conceded by everybody that the man nominated was the attorney—there were a number of other attorneys—at the head of the organization of attorneys who were opposing the valuation of the railroads then going on before the Interstate Commerce Commission. He was at the head of the list of attorneys who were making the fight on behalf of the railroads. I say that without criticism of any of them; they had a perfect right to do that; but the man who was at the head of that list of attorneys was appointed by the President to become a Justice of the Supreme Court.

It was argued here—I remember it so distinctly that I can pick out the seat of practically every Senator who participated in that debate—it was argued on one side that there was a question coming before the Supreme Court which had not yet been determined and which was probably the most important question that had come before the Supreme Court for a hundred years. It had to do with the valuation of the railroads, a work in which the Interstate Commerce Commission, under a law of Congress, had been engaged for quite a number of years. They were nearly ready to present one case, at least, that would test and try out the question before the Supreme Court whether the Commisison had followed the right process in the mind of the Court in reaching a valuation. The man who had been on one side of the controversy, the leader, was selected to go on to the Court just before that question was going to be submitted to the Supreme Court.

That was the main objection to this man. His ability was not questioned; his honesty was not questioned; but the objection was that a man who had been engaged in that work would have a settled view on it and of the whole situation, and that, while he might be perfectly competent and perfectly honest, as he came fresh from the controversy, in all probability, unless he were broad-minded beyond the ordinary individual, he would not be able to dissociate himself from the years of work that he had put in on that question which he was going to be called upon to decide.

The answer—a perfectly good answer from a technical standpoint—was made here on the floor that while that was all true, when that case came on before the Supreme Court this man would stand aside and would not participate. It was said, and it is true, that a lawyer with an important practice, when he goes on the Bench, will find himself confronted, especially soon after he goes on the Bench, with cases in which he participated as an attorney and he must call in some other judge to decide the case. Everybody knew that was true. That was the question in a nutshell that was submitted to the Senate. The nomination was confirmed.

Then what happened? The O'Fallon case was soon coming on to be argued in the Supreme Court, but ahead of that case came the Indianapolis Water Works case, where identically the same question was involved. The valuation of the water company in the city of Indianapolis and the method the commission of Indiana had taken to find the valuation of that water company were the whole questions at issue. The rate the company could charge for water depended upon the valuation, and that was the controversy; and the same controversy was under consideration in the O'Fallon case, the decision in which settled the valuation of all the railroads of the United States supposedly through eternity.

That question was argued in the Supreme Court before the Railroad case was argued. Everybody knew the identical question was involved in both; and the man who had been confirmed sat with the Court in determining that question. Not only that but when the Court reached a conclusion—there was a divided Court—he wrote the opinion of the Court, and it became the law of the land that governed railroad-valuation cases just as completely as though the decision had been made in those cases. So when the question of the valuation of railroads came on it came into the Court then with that question already determined, true to what Senators said here, behind closed doors when that nomination was under consideration, the man who had been confirmed at that time stepped aside and did not participate in the railroad case. Mr. President, it was not necessary for him to step aside; the question had been previously determined.

The propriety of doing that has been discussed by lawyers all over the United States and some interesting magazine articles and law journals have been written on it. That is the history; and since most of those who participated in it are dead and those who remain will probably soon be dead, I am glad, with the permission of the Senator from Minnesota, to relate that history for the RECORD.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was chairman of the State Public Service Commission of Louisiana at the time of this fateful history, and I want to add a few words. Contrary to what had been given us to understand, as I think the Senator from Nebraska will remember, there had been a rule of valuation established by the Supreme Court.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. LONG. They had a rule of valuation established for 30 years. William Jennings Bryan was the chief counsel in the case of Smythe against Ames, and the Supreme Court had written a clause as to valuation, reading about as follows:

> That there should be considered the cost of the property, the value of its bonds and of its stocks, and all such factors.

They had established a rule of valuation, and they not only had established it, but we knew that efforts had been made for 30 years to try to rig up the Supreme Court. Case after case came before the Supreme Court in which they adhered to the doctrine of Smythe against Ames, within as short a time, I will say, as 2 or 3 months of the day when Justice Butler was appointed to the Supreme Court. I was hearing the rate case of the Southwestern Gas & Electric Co., and when Mr. Dufour read of the appointment of Justice Butler, and I will never forget his remark—

> That settles the question; we will have no more trouble, and this matter will now be determined predominantly upon the present value reproduction cost new, less depreciation.

I want to call attention to something else the Supreme Court did. When we were trying little Louderback here the other day I felt like weeping when I realized that time was being spent on the question of whether he slept somewhere he ought not to have slept. We were trying that poor little devil on the ground that there was a cat in somebody's house that ran him out, and I felt sorry for him. Now let me tell you what was done right under the dome of the Capitol; and it is of record. Here is what we let the nine black-robed high priests do. They had held that going-concern value was a discretionary value that the commission could allow or not allow, but that it was not confiscatory if the commission did not allow it. They then held that interest on the investment during the period of construction was a discretionary item that the commission could allow or not allow, but it was not confiscatory not to allow it. Time after time I had written orders in which I had not allowed it, and the courts had sustained the action on the ground that it was strictly within the commission's sound discretion as to whether it would allow going-concern value and interest on investment during construction, but when Mr. Justice Butler went on the Supreme Bench the Court wrote into the law that it is confiscation of property not to add investment during construction and going-concern value.

I read the other day that maybe they have now taken goodwill out of going-concern value and are fixing to lump another thing or so on top of what they have already done. It has been positively, openly, and boldly known that the Supreme Court of the United States was rigged up with the chief counsel advocating that revolutionary theory to pyramid these values, and that he was put on there within 2 months after the Court had restated the rule that had been the law of this country since the Republic was created. As a result of that appointment they rigged up and pyramided the values to where, notwithstanding the fact that the total value of the railroad securities on the market today is around eight and a half billion dollars, they will be able to go into court and sustain a valuation and to receive a return on a valuation perhaps as high as $30,000,000,000.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I believe that the rule of cost of production new had not been written into a decision by the Supreme Court until the Indianapolis Water Rate case. I knew that the Supreme Court had made some decision on the question of valuation for the purpose of rate-making, but my information was that the cost-of-production-new rule was first written into the Indianapolis Water Rate case.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, they had stated that it was something to be considered but not to be the yardstick of value. They had stated that along with cost and value of stocks and bonds, the present cost of reproducing the property should be considered. They were trying to make them adopt that as a yardstick, and they finally did.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. That was the method of valuation that Mr. Butler, as attorney for the railway executives, who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission, advocated for years.

Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this phase of the subject today, but so long as the question has been raised I want to finish the story.

The next case that came up after the Indianapolis Water Rate case was the O'Fallon case. I do not remember whether it was Mr. Justice McReynolds or Mr. Justice Sutherland who wrote that decision, but that case was sent back with an admonition to the Interstate Commerce Commission reminding them that they had not taken into consideration cost of reproduction new. When they were reminded of that rule, how could the Commission decide to what extent they should take into consideration the cost of production new? They must take it totally into consideration or not at all, it seems to me.

The next word came in the Street Railway case from Baltimore. Another judge wrote that opinion and, overturning the State commission findings, said that the cost of reproduction new has long been the policy of the Supreme Court. So far as I know it had been the policy of the Court only since the writing of the opinion in the Indianapolis Water Rate case, but that was sufficient.

Now, in this bill we are going to change that principle. It came out yesterday in the debate when the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] said that the old principle had proved unsatisfactory; that the old valuation since the enactment of the transportation law, based upon the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission during the period 1914 to 1918, had proved unsatisfactory; so now under this bill the principle for the basis of rate making is going to be changed. Rates are going to be fixed on the basis of cost of production of service, according to the interpretation of the Senator from Washington. If I misunderstood the Senator, I wish to be enlightened.

What does that mean? It seems to me that a very good reason for abandoning cost of reproduction new based upon valuation for rate-making purposes fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is that the cost of reproduction new is now an entirely different matter than it was during the period of high prices, and will ultimately force a reduction of rates. So the principle for rate making is now being changed to cost of production of service. What is likely to happen as a result of that rule if it becomes law? I am sorry the Senator from Washington is not present at the moment, because I want to be corrected if I misunderstood him in his interpretation of the bill yesterday.

Let us see what is going to happen. If we change the basis of rate making to fix rates on the cost of production of service, where will that bring us? The cost of reproduction new does not take into consideration capital structure. Under that principle of rate making the Interstate Commerce Commission fixed a valuation for rate-making purposes, in round numbers, of $15,000,000,000, but now we are going to get away from that. Now we are going to fix the rates on the basis of the cost of production of service. That, it seems to me, brings in the difference between the $15,000,000,000 for rate-making purposes and the $24,000,000,000 of capital structure demanding dividends and interest. Certainly the cost of dividends and interest on the capital structure must be figured in the cost of production of service. Then we have a much broader basis and a much better excuse for raising rates than we had on the basis of the valuation of $15,000,000,000 for rate-making purposes.

This will add additional burden to the weight already carried by the public in high freight and passenger rates.

It will be borne in mind that wages of railroad workers now employed have already been reduced by one hundred and sixty to two hundred million dollars per year for the benefit of stockholders and bondholders.

What is true of the capital structure of railroads I believe to be practically true of every capital structure of every large industry in the United States. The capital structure for industry and the transportation systems has placed upon them, in my opinion, a fixed overhead charge that has more to do or as much to do with the break-down of our agriculture, commercial life, with the break-down of trade and commerce, as had the peddling of billions and billions of paper with gold stars on it by the bankers throughout the country to get the people's savings for pieces of paper which they could produce for less than a cent apiece, dissipating the savings of the people, destroying their purchasing power, taxing the necessities of life through price fixing and through the fixing of high rates for transportation, taking so much of the production of wealth of the great mass of the people as to break down and destroy their purchasing power.

I am reminded of a story that is told of a rule in the Middle Ages which provided that when a man had committed murder, in punishment the corpse of the murdered person was tied to his body and he had to drag it around with him until there was nothing left of it. With this dead capital structure representing dead material, worn-out, obsolete equipment, worn out a long time ago, I wonder how long that corpse shall be hung around the necks of the American people, not only the transportation industry, but also all the more important other industries of the country.

It seems to me if it is true, as the Senator from Washington stated on yesterday, that we are now going to fix rates for the railroads on the basis of the cost of production of service, that instead of getting reduction of rates we will get an increase of rates. We have then got to take into consideration the interest and dividends on the capital structure. The question is, Ought we to do that? With that record of financing which dates back as far as we have any records, how long are we going to continue?

I point to the capital structure of the railroad industry. It is customary to call an "enemy of the railroads" one who deigns to criticize them. It seems to me that those who have enacted the legislation to help the railroads have been their worst enemies. They have not, in my opinion, helped the railroads. They have helped the speculators and bondholders but may ruin all of them. Let me refer to the Steel Corporation. When it was formed, the various companies of which it was composed were paid in obligations of the Steel Corporation to the value of 5 to 10 times the physical value of the property. What has that to do with the railroads? It has this to do with the railroads. Up to the time the Steel Corporation was formed Andrew Carnegie with some associates had made a great deal of money in the steel industry by making and selling steel rails for $20 a ton.

When the Steel Corporation was organized, those companies were paid in debentures and obligations of the Steel Corporation from 5 to 10 times the physical value of their property. I think that is generally well known. It is common knowledge. Certainly I have it on the word of one of Andrew Carnegie's partners. To pay a return upon that fictitious capitalization, in 1900 they raised the price of steel rails to $28 a ton. The common stock represented no value except potential earnings of the future, and before the war sold as low as $8 a share. I am not sure that it may not have sold even lower than that.

Up until 1915 the Steel Corporation made and sold rails for $8 a ton more than had been charged by Andrew Carnegie. During the war they raised the price of steel rails to $53 a ton and held it there. They finally reduced it to $45 a ton, then to $43 a ton, and last fall, with a great show of patriotism, reduced the price of steel rails to $40 a ton after they had cut the wages of their laboring men twice. In 1929 Steel common stock sold for $200 per share. Rather than reduce the price of steel so the people with diminishing purchasing power could buy, they went down to 12 or 15 percent of production capacity in order to maintain prices if purchasing power ever should come back. All these years they have been selling steel rails to the railroads at prices varying from $53 a ton down to the present time, when they are selling at $40 a ton. I have been told that if they would be satisfied with an honest return on an honest capitalization, they could still make and sell steel rails as low as Andrew Carnegie did. But the steel industry, dominated by the same group that dominated the railroads, had to do something with the price of steel in order to collect for the steel industry out of the railroads, making the public pay $53 a ton for steel rails in order that the same interests that control the steel industry, which in turn control the railroads, might use the railroads as a collection agency for the steel industry because they have the power to fix the price.

In turn what did they do for the railroads, the same interests that dominate the steel industry and that also dominate the railroads? They charged the railroads $53 a ton for steel rails. The Federal Trade Commission has given us an example of what they did for the railroads, in their report showing what they had discovered in investigating the cement industry. On the one item of cement the Federal Trade Commission showed that the railroads had exacted an unjustified charge upon the consumers of that one commodity of $31,000,000 a year. That was to help the railroads so that they could pay $40 to $53 a ton for steel rails.

Those are merely two items to show the interlocking, milking process by the same banking groups who dominate the steel industry, who dominate the transportation industry, and many other industries, and to a large extent banking, and the public pays the price.

This tremendous capital structure lying as a burden upon the railroads of the country is making it necessary, through the control of industry, for one to help the other and then one to milk the other, until it finally comes back to the source of it all. It seems to me that under this bill, when we change the basis for rate-making purposes from the value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission based upon cost of reproduction new, or cost of reproduction less depreciation, and adopt the principle of basing the rates upon the cost of service, that affords a chance to bring in this extra capitalization to collect enough to pay interest on the $10,000,000,000 of stocks and bonds in excess of what the Interstate Commerce Commission allowed as a valuation for purposes of rate making.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Taking the position that the Senator does on the rate-making power provided for in this bill, has he suggested or is he going to suggest any amendment that will correct this evil, if it be an evil, and provide a method, according to his theory of arriving at a just and fair rate?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I did not see this bill until yesterday. I have given it some thought. I do not see how this bill can be changed so as to effectively remedy the matter. I said, in opening my remarks to the Senate this morning, that I wanted to discuss the bill from a different angle than that from which it has been discussed so far. I wanted to discuss it from the standpoint that I have discussed it, hoping to show the impossibility of changing the rate structure or the capital structure so long as the railroads remain in private corporate possession.

To show their influence, and how this capital structure has been built up and is now saddled on the backs of the American people, I desire to read an extract from a report of the Interstate Commerce Commission given in an address by Mr. Samuel Untermyer on the 27th day of February 1933, at the University Club of Los Angeles. This capital structure has been built up in the way stated by Mr. Untermyer, and it is all in this chart. All the things he enumerates here, taken from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, are in the structure shown on the chart.

He says:

During the years from 1912 to 1915, many complaints were made by shippers and the public to Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission of illegal practices of five important systems of railways and their resulting inefficiency of service and unjust rates. The Commission accordingly made extended investigations and issued official reports of findings between the years 1913 and 1917 respecting these practices and the financial transactions of these five systems, embracing approximately one third of the country's entire mileage. The systems so investigated were the New Haven, Louisville & Nashville, Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, St. Louis & San Francisco, and the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, and Pere Marquette.

Now, here is what the Commission said:

The evidence and findings of the Commission are published in their official reports and disclose, among others, the following facts:

(1) That each railroad company investigated knowingly falsified its accounts, partly to hide expenditures of large sums for the control of politics and elections and to influence legislation and the administration of laws.

(2) Falsified its accounts respecting capital, expenses, and profits so that the Commission was unable to ascertain for what purpose vast sums had been expended.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the date of that report?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1917, after an investigation lasting over several weeks.

(3) In many cases the books and accounts were burned by the directors in order to hide various illegal transactions. Many of these acts were done by directors who were well known as among the world's most powerful financiers. Even though many records were wilfully destroyed the Commission was able to secure sufficient evidence to disclose the names, dates, and facts.

The Commission's report, in order to bring these various illegal practices in systematic order before Congress and the people, was classified as follows:

(a) Extravagant speculations and purchases of worthless securities in the interest of the directors; peculations from the stockholders, many by illegal devices accompanied by the falsification of books and accounts and their later burning by the directors.

(b) Illegally spending the stockholders' money and property to corruptly influence politics, the press, and public opinion, and to secure secrecy respecting their accounts.

(c) Acts to secure a monopoly against the public interest by the violation of the laws of many States as well as of the Nation.

(d) The organization by the railway directors of "fake" corporations and "dummy" officers to hide the identity of real promoters and shield them from prosecution.

(e) The voting to themselves by directors of extravagant salaries, in addition to which large sums were taken by some of these officials without warrant of law.

(4) As these corrupt practices, including falsifying of records, etc., are common to all the railroads investigated, a résumé of the New Haven system investigation will suffice for all.

I am not going to take the time to read that; but if there is no objection, I ask to have this address printed as a public document. These influences enumerated indicate forces so powerful as to frustrate any public control of these corporations by the Government that created them. The creature now controls its creator.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed as a public document.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. All these things are in the capital structure shown on this chart. They are all here.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are preparing, however, to suspend the Sherman antitrust law, are we not, to give them an opportunity to do the same thing again?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That law has never been enforced except against labor organizations.

This capital structure is a corpse from the past, by means of which the American people are still carrying, on their backs, through transportation rates, the locomotives and box cars and steel rails bought and worn out 30 and 40 years ago.

The railroads were able to do that only because for years the railroad-transportation industry has been a monopoly. It is now quite likely that it will cease to be a monopoly. I do not mean to say that we do not have to have railroads. We need railroads; but they have ceased to be a monopoly, and I am wondering if that is another reason why the principle of rate making is changed in this bill.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] this morning, before he left the Chamber for a time, asked if in this bill there was any provision for reduction of rates; and, owing to interruptions, I was not at that time able to answer the Senator. I said there was not any provision in the bill that I could see for reduction of rates; but in the discussion that followed the Senator's presence in the Chamber, I called attention to the debate in the Senate yesterday in which it was brought out that in this bill the principle of rate making is entirely changed, and the rates from now on are to be based upon the cost of rendering the service, and that in my opinion gives a broad basis upon which to raise freight rates instead of reducing them, because interest and dividends on this capital structure—$10,000,000,000 in excess of the amount fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of rate making—it seems to me, will now be taken into account because the $10,000,000,000 in additional capital structure is part of the cost of rendering the service.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to read the modification of section 15a as it appears in this bill under paragraph (2)?

In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic.

That was discussed at some length in the committee, looking toward the competition that is here in the form of the internal-combustion engine, trucks, and busses, motor traffic, and it was the opinion of some members of the committee that this would give to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the roads the power to meet this competition. The Senator will notice that the language is—give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic—

Of course, meaning on the movement of traffic over railroads. Now—to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient railway transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service—

That was on a cost basis—

and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable the carriers, under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service.

I think the committee were convinced that that liberalization or changing of the basis of rate making was for the purpose of meeting the inevitable competition that is here.

All of us understand that this competition is here. I desire to call the Senate's attention to the fact that under the Esch-Cummins Act all the railroad property devoted to public use as a whole—not in any particular system, but all of it—was to be valued, and upon that aggregate value the Interstate Commerce Commission was authorized and directed to fix a rate that would return, on all this property, as nearly as possible the rate allowed. The maximum rate allowed was 6 percent. Now, with this coordinator appointed who is to take into consideration the competition that is here, and the changed relation of the public, and the dependence of the public upon this system, the Senator said that there was no probability of there being any writing-down of the burden on the public. This coordinator is given the power to eliminate certain roads which in his judgment are not necessary for the public convenience and necessity, and also to reduce the activities of any of the trunk lines leading into any of the metropolitan areas.

Does the Senator understand that in spite of the discontinuance of some lines, and the reduction of the activities of others for a period, and the interchanging that is provided for—to illustrate, three roads arrange to have one use its equipment for a certain part of the time, and to have another use its equipment for a certain part of the time—under the terms of this bill no reduction is to be made in the burden on the public, when we shall have eliminated so many millions of property, like these box cars and engines and equipment, which under the law were the property of the people who held the mortgages, and at the time of the Esch-Cummins Act were the basis of rate making? Does he think we still will have to pay the same rates and fares with all this property eliminated under the coordinator?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator find anything in the bill to make it possible to reduce those rates and fares?

Mr. SMITH. In drafting this paragraph to which I have called attention, I think the committee had in view the idea that it would give the railroads leeway to meet this competition in such a way wherever it was necessary to sustain the roads, and where it was not necessary to eliminate them.

Mr. BORAH. That might result in a raise of freight rates.

Mr. SMITH. It might, but everything depends upon the administration of the law.

Mr. BORAH. Unless we deal with the capital structure of the roads, how is it possible to reduce rates under the provision here?

Mr. SMITH. That was the question I asked the Senator. It is provided that the coordinator shall have power to suspend operations on roads and eliminate certain roads from being carriers at all, and it does seem to me that if that is eliminated the public ought not to be called upon to pay for something which is not devoted to their use.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, let us look at the background of this measure. What is the background? The background is furnished by the hue and cry that the railroads are hard up, that they cannot pay a return on their capital structure. So they come to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; for what purpose? To get money from the Government of the United States so that the railroads can hand it over to the bondholders, so that the bondholders shall get their interest. That is all there is to it. It is proposed that under this bill there shall be a great deal of saving, in order to help the railroads out of the financial difficulty in which they are now, when they have to come to the Government for Government money to pay to the bondholders.

Mr. BORAH. But not to reduce freight rates.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; there is nothing here about reducing freight rates. I think we have a right to assume that if they make any savings, those savings will not be reflected in reduced freight rates, but will be paid over to the holders of the bonds in lieu of the money we have so far borrowed for the railroads from the United States Government. I think that is a natural and a reasonable assumption.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it not true that the very object and purpose of this bill is to relieve the railroads financially?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course. Let us see how they have saved some money. We have heard a great deal about the very efficient management of the railroads since 1920 under the Transportation Act, and we are also told that great savings have been effected as a result of this very efficient management. How much has been saved?

From 1920 to 1929 the operating expenses of the roads were reduced $1,322,000,000. That is what they said.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, there is so much disorder in the Senate that it is impossible to hear the very interesting speech of the Senator from Minnesota. May we not have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, from 1920 to 1929 there was saved in operating expenses by the railroads the total sum of $1,322,000,000. How were those savings effected?

The sum of $785,000,000 out of that $1,322,000,000—almost 75 percent of the saving in the operating expenses—was taken out of whom? That was made out of the discharge of 361,982 employees, a saving on the pay roll, a saving at the expense of the human element, undoubtedly due to large equipment, heavier steel, heavier locomotives, heavier box cars, larger trains, reduced grades, and so forth. So labor lost $785,000,000 out of the railroad plants between 1920 and 1929.

In 1920 there were employed on the railroads 2,022,832 men. In 1929 there were employed on the railroads 1,660,850 men; 361,982 had been discharged, and Mr. Fletcher, who speaks for the Association of Railroad Presidents, is reported to have said before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce on Monday that if the amendments adopted by the Senate on yesterday are kept in the bill, the bill had better not pass.

While labor in the aggregate lost $785,000,000 in that period of time, how did those who hold the bonds and the stocks fare? Dividends on this part of the capital inside this white dotted line on the chart represent a little less than $2,000,000,000 out of the value of the properties and the plants for rate-making purposes. That part of the capital structure received $331,102,938 in dividends in 1920. In 1923, 3 years later, when the income to labor in the aggregate was going down, their dividends increased to $405,190,775. While the aggregate income to labor was still declining, by December 31, 1929, dividends were paid of $555,692,172.

In 1920, 57.31 percent of the stock was paying dividends. By 1929, 77.82 percent of the stock was paying dividends.

It seems to me that we have to do something with this condition and get rid of it, not only in the transportation industry but in every industry of large productive capacity in the United States.

There is one thing we are going to do now. Because it is an illusion unless we get rid of this capital structure, now we are going to liquidate that. We are going to make an attempt to restore prosperity by an inflation of the currency and a cheapening of the dollar, but if we continue the policy of carrying these corpses of capital structures around with us, with the tremendous overhead charges, the remedy, through inflation, will be temporary and will be a bitter illusion, because these industries having the power to fix prices are fixing prices now in anticipation of a higher price level, ready to take advantage of any advance in price to mulct the consumer through overhead charges of the finished products in steel and cement and lumber and transportation. Unless something is done, in my humble opinion, to change the economic policies affecting the capital structures not only of transportation but of the great productive, fundamental industries of the country, we are only postponing the inevitable collapse that is bound to come. We cannot travel in circles, with artificial remedies, putting artificial policies into practice, when the fundamentals of the overhead fixed charges are the capital debts and structures, and the power of fixing the prices of the necessities of life through lack of enforcement of the antitrust acts, as, for instance, in industries producing steel, power and light, cement, and so forth. The great mass of the public will continue to be mulcted and purchasing power will not return, and the house of cards will collapse, as it did in 1929.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Would the Senator suggest that, either by this measure or by some subsequent measure, the railroads be required to amortize, from their earnings, some definite portion of their funded debt; and if that were done, would it not be necessary also to circumscribe their right to issue stock? Then again a further problem intrudes itself, as I look at this whole question of establishing a rate base and setting up a rate structure. If, as the Senator says, these railroads are not capitalized to an extent equal to their rate base, then it is going to be very difficult to get at the thing by merely compelling them to amortize a part of their capital structure represented by funded debt, because, if they are permitted to pay interest and dividends on their rate base in excess of their capitalization, society can get no relief from that. I was wondering what the Senator's idea on that subject is.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Capitalization is more than the rate base.

Mr. BONE. I misunderstood the Senator. I understood the capitalization was less than the rate base.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; it is $10,000,000,000 more. I think it is possibly 20 years too late to expect to get any reduction in the capital structure with the railroads in the hands of private corporations. I do not think there is any remedy except for the Government to take them over, under condemnation proceedings, pay the holders a fair price on whatever they may be worth but not pay again for the railroad locomotives and cars that were bought and worn out 30 or 40 years ago and are still in this capital structure. I do not think that the railroads can charge a rate high enough to yield a return. If they do, in my opinion the people will not be able to afford to use the railroads, and they cannot get the business.

Mr. BONE. There have been many years when many of the railroads paid a reasonable return on all the outstanding stock.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, yes; but the capital structure has never been so heavy as it is now.

Mr. BONE. The Senator is fully aware of the fact, I know, that one of the arguments of the private utilities is that the amount of outstanding bonds and stocks bears no relation whatever to the valuation upon which they predicate earnings. Nevertheless, they have issued almost invariably, and frequently, more stock and bonds than the rate base established by regulatory bodies of one kind or another. I spoke of that a few days ago on the floor of the Senate in describing the White Salmon affair out in the State of Washington, where ten and a half million dollars in securities were issued against a bare water right which represented not a dollar of investment, and yet those securities were outstanding for years, and the company was paying 10 or 12 percent interest on them. Yet we have a splendid system of State regulation out there, but it did not regulate, and we cannot regulate these private utilities.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am aware that the question of capital issues has not, as a rule, been taken into consideration for rate-making purposes. However, under this bill if we are to base rates on the cost of production and service we have got to take into account the interest paid on capital structure. It is part of the cost of service. The question to determine is how much of it is legitimate; how much, in justice, right, and equity, should the public be charged upon properties that carry in them so much dead weight that has been paid for time and time again?

During the last 20 years the interest and dividends paid by the railroad companies to the stockholders and the bondholders are in excess of $16,000,000,000; this is more than was paid for the plant, according to the valuation fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. How many times the American people paid for the plant prior to 20 years ago we do not know.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, can the Senator inform us whether they are carrying in that valuation the value of land grants?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They are carrying everything.

Mr. BONE. In other words, they capitalize all these gifts, and the American people are paying interest and dividends on the things they have given the railroad. That is right, is it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator sure about their including the land grants? I am not disputing it; I simply ask for information.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Some of the lands that were sold have been distributed in dividends. Take, for instance, the lands that were obtained free for rights of way and for terminals; it must be remembered that to a large extent terminals and rights of way were obtained during an early period in the country, when people were anxious to have railroads and they gave them the rights of way and they gave them the terminals for nothing, but, of course, they are in the capitalization; it is all in there; and the unearned increment, as the value of those lands has increased, has been included.

Mr. BORAH. Have the public-land grants been incorporated in the capitalization?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is my information—those that have not as a result of sale been distributed as dividends. For instance, a railroad got a large land grant which it sold to settlers, and so forth. The Northern Pacific has a great holding company possessing farm lands, mineral lands, timber lands. It is called the "Northern Holding Co.", or something like that.

Mr. BONE. Prof. Benjamin Andrews described all that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And the company has earnings from that source; the holding company has paid dividends to the Northern Pacific; and I think the same thing is true of the Burlington.

In 1920, when the railroads were returned to their owners after Federal control, the class I corporations owned 235,233 miles of main lines and branches. They had sold to the public seven billions of stock and they had issued bonds and other interest-bearing obligations amounting to ten more billions of dollars.

Everything available had been capitalized, including one billion representing the value of the aids, gifts, grants, and donations received from a generous public. In this aggregate there was also capitalized another billion, which represented no property at all, but was a compact of pure losses through improvident financing, building, and operation. That is included in one of the items I read this morning and embraces such things as reorganization expenses, receivers' fees, and so forth, which are in the capital structure.

Even then the aggregate of stocks and debts were determined, through the careful valuation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be some five and one half billions in excess of the cost of reproducing everything the corporations owned. That was at the end of the period of valuation in 1918.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, figuring all these things in, said that the railroads had capitalized and issued bonds for five and a half billion dollars more than the valuation they found upon their property, and since then, I think, they have increased their capital structure without appreciably increasing any railroad mileage by $4,150,000,000, in round numbers.

In January 1931, with no appreciable increase in productive mileage, stocks had increased to nine and one half billions and debts to twelve and one half billions.

The basis of the major portion of this mounting structure of shares and debts is the value of the private highway and the improvements on it. Technically this is termed the "permanent way and structures." The provision of the vehicles, the motive power, and equipment have always represented but a comparatively minor part of the total investment.

Substantially all of this railroad mileage is now more than 30 years old. Most of it is twice or three times that age. Yet none of this investment in permanent way and structures has ever been written down or off. Indeed, under corporate ownership there is no incentive to do so, for railroad finance has seen to it that rates shall be regulated and that the rate base shall be the value of the property, not the value of the service. Reduction in investment through charges for depreciation and obsolescence means a reduction in the basis upon which profits are computed. These items are never written off.

The public is today paying rates which are calculated to earn a profit, for example, on the present value of 17,000,000 acres of land donated to the corporations 60 or 70 or 100 years ago. This item alone was valued at three hundred and eighty-six millions before 1920 and has risen substantially since. The proceeds of another 135,000,000 acres granted free to the corporations and sold to the public for another three hundred and seventy-five millions have also been partially capitalized and partially distributed in dividends. Every improvement which has since been put on this land has likewise been capitalized. That reference is to the rights-of-way terminals, and lands used by the carrier corporations.

The public has been paying this profit on this capitalization year by year, in the form of interest and dividends, ever since these private highways began to function, and there seems to be no means of escaping this theory of fair charges so long as these essentially public highways remain in corporate hands.

Since the commencement of the twentieth century the development of the internal-combustion engine, the immense increase in the supplies of gasoline at low price, and the rapid construction of a system of connected hard-surfaced highways some three times the aggregate of the railroad mileage, and the gradual but steady improvement of our great system of inland and coastwise waterways, have brought about something resembling a revolution in our domestic means of transportation. It has greatly reduced the railroad revenues from passenger travel and has begun to make inroads in the returns from freight traffic. There is ample evidence that this change has come about because the highways and the waterways provide a means of travel and transport cheaper or more convenient than that furnished by the railroads.

There is a growing cleavage between the prices at which transportation can be purchased from the railroads and upon the public highways and waterways, and there undoubtedly has been a substantial growth in the travel furnished and traffic moved by these auxiliary services. This slippage is not, however, the principal cause of the present low state to which railroad revenues have fallen. The purpose of all our railroad legislation was to protect the public against the piling of burden upon burden to be used as a basis for gouging the public; it was to protect the public, to protect labor, the investor, and to continue the operation of the railroad plant; but in view of present conditions, I think we have failed in achieving the justifiable objects which the legislation intended or we were told were intended to be accomplished by it. This situation is becoming a public menace.

The plight of the railroad is bad, although not nearly so bad as is claimed. The people who own railroad securities, almost unanimously, have raised a Babel of confusion and of tongues, all crying about the terrible condition of the railroads, and claim that the only remedy is to charge higher rates and lay off more men. I want to call the attention of the Senate to something that I think is really the matter with the railroads, so that we may direct our attention to that part of the trouble that is afflicting the railroads.

Those who claim to be the saviors of the railroads say there is no other remedy than to increase rates and to lay off more men and to reduce service to the public.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator referred a few moments ago to the antitrust laws. Is it the purpose of the Senator before he takes his seat to discuss the suspension of the antitrust laws proposed by this bill?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I had not intended to speak as long as I have. I wanted to talk about the capital structure of the railroads. As I have informed the Senate—I do not know whether the Senator was here—I did not see this bill until yesterday morning; what little I know about it I gathered from the debate yesterday and from the little time I have had to look into it since last night. There may be other features that are more worthy of discussion than this, but I wanted to discuss this feature.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think other features are more worthy of discussion, but I should like somebody to explain why the provision to which I have referred is in this bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator has just referred to the suggestion that it is necessary to lay off railroad employees.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is not my contention.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that, but that argument has been made and that carries with it the idea on the part of those who believe in it that the railroads are suffering from overpayments to their men. If the Senator does not object, I should like to insert in the RECORD at this place two or three figures on that proposition.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The labor cost of operation per 1,000 ton-miles in 1920 was eighty-two ten thousandths of a cent; in 1929 it dropped to sixty ten thousandths; in 1932 it dropped still further to fifty-nine ten thousandths, showing that the labor cost has been going down. But, in addition to that, in 1920 the ratio of pay rolls to total income of the railroads was 47.3 and in 1931 it was the same, but in 1920 the ratio of fixed charges to which the Senator is referring, and dividends to the total income was 11.05, while in 1932 it had risen to 22.2. In other words, the fixed charges had doubled while the ratio of the pay rolls to the total income had not increased at all, refuting the argument which the Senator states has been made with reference to the wages dragging down the railroads. As a matter of fact, the number of employees has been steadily decreasing until now it is less than a million.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is correct.

Mr. BLACK. And the cost of the wages has been steadily decreasing, but the amount of money devoted to capital investment, which as the Senator shows has not greatly increased, has been steadily mounting.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There has been an increase of $4,150,000,000 in the capital structure since the date of valuation in 1918 up to 1929, I think.

Mr. President, in reference to what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said about the Sherman antitrust law, I am not able to discuss that law now except to say it has not been enforced, but I am glad the Senator mentioned it, because it shows the importance of earnestly considering legislation and of not being too much in a hurry to pass it. If we have an extra day or an extra 2 days we may know where we are. I am convinced that I am right in my discussion of this feature of the bill and I trust I have convinced the Senate. I want to hear discussion by Senators of other phases of the bill, for I do not think we should hastily pass legislation of this importance, as we have been passing other legislation, later on to discover that it is something entirely different from what we thought it was. I am not saying that it is, but to me it appears that it is entirely a different proposition from what I had been led to believe. I do not mean to say that anyone has been trying to deceive me or the Senate, but when it comes to helping the railroads it is a good deal like helping anybody else; it is a question of whether we help somebody to die or help somebody to live.

Under any defensible system of corporation finance, most of the plant having become obsolete and having been paid for, it should have been taken out of the capital structure long ago.

The better alternative, it would seem, is to proceed now to bring the charging system of the railroads, as rapidly as possible, into conformity with the needs of a settled state and get away from the old pioneer method of financing and building railroads. There cannot be much hope of reducing that capital structure so long as the railroads are in the hands of private corporations. That I think has already been demonstrated after 12 years' sad experience in trying by legislation to make strong corporations help carry the weak ones. That was the purpose of the Transportation Act, to effect consolidations, so that the strong railroads might carry the weak. The money was collected, but the railroads did not turn over that money, and now, under this bill, I understand we are going to pay it back to them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was a member of the committee. I understood the way the money was to be disbursed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the short lines. That is the one difficulty I have with the bill now. Apparently the money is not going to the short lines but is going back to the railroads, and the short lines will fare badly under any sort of amalgamation that takes place among the big railroads. Has an amendment been offered to strike out that provision with reference to the disbursement of the money?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That I cannot tell the Senator. Under the Transportation Act provisions were made for consolidations of railroads. The Penn Road Co. was formed and sold $150,000,000 worth of stock to the public at $15 a share. They took that money obtained from the public and invested it in the stocks of other roads, paying as high as $120 a share. I understand the stock of the Penn Road Co. is now selling around $1.50 or $2 a share. That is an instance of the unfortunate experience we have had in the consolidation of railroads under the regulation of the Transportation Act. Somebody got that $150,000,000. Whether it did the Pennsylvania Railroad any good we do not know, but they got the money from the public.

How infinitely more difficult it must be to enforce by law a system through which the capital structure will be written down from year to year until only the investment in equipment remains. Yet that is the only sound theory upon which the Nation can proceed. It seems obvious that the business of a settled country cannot go on paying for these roads and buildings and bridges and permanent improvements over and over again, as we have been doing for a hundred years. While we pay for them over and over again we are all the time asked to pay more. Look at the increase of $4,151,000,000 in the capitalization from the time of the valuation up until 1931.

We can never have a defensible system of railroad finance, we can never hope to have railroad rates based upon the cost of service so long as the railroad properties remain in corporate hands. The incentive to accomplish these public objectives is utterly lacking so long as the properties are owned by corporations dedicated to earning an annual profit on these ancient properties which have been several times paid for, as well as upon the service which they perform.

We will make little progress toward the elimination of competitive waste under private corporate ownership of the railroads, for the competitive spirit permeates the whole body of railroad finance and management and is to a large extent the cause of the terrific waste in the transportation system.

We will begin to make real progress toward a satisfactory railroad service at fair rates and wages when we have learned that there are several ways by which we can have Government ownership with private operation of our railroads. Permanent Government ownership of the permanent way and structures seems to offer the only means by which the plant can ever be made to operate solely in the public interest. If, having become the owner of the property, Congress decides to lease the equipment and motive power to corporations for regional operation, there are precedents upon which such leases can be drawn. The public interest can be thoroughly safeguarded against extortion in the framing of such leases and we will doubtless find that the better part of individual initiative can be preserved under such circumstances.

In Germany the Government owns the railroads and finances all kinds of competition for the railroads. I asked a member of the German Government how they could afford to finance competition for the railroads in the form of waterways and highways, and he said they would bring business to the railroads. Ships that come up the rivers and canals cannot carry the freight inland, and so the railroads have their business increased. They get business for the railroads by encouraging competition; that is, they carry freight that would not otherwise move.

Mr. President, the time of the Senate that I have taken has been taken for the purpose of expressing my conviction that we are approaching the question of transportation by railroads from the wrong angle. What is true of the railroads, as I have said, is in my opinion also true of the great fundamental producing industries of the country—the overhead deadweight of capital. Until that is taken care of I do not think we can come back to a healthy economical operation of business and trade and transportation.

So far as the railroads are concerned, I do not mean to overemphasize their condition and what ought to be done, because they are only a part of our economic life. I sometimes think we approach these things too often from a local point of view and much like the six blind men of Hindustan who were asked to describe an elephant. One grabbed his tail and said, "He is like a snake." The other felt of his trunk and said, "He is like a rope." Another got hold of his leg and said, "He is like a tree." Still another got hold of his stomach and said, "He is like a house." I think we have been too blind in studying this white elephant we have on our hands in the form of an overcapitalized industrial and transportation structure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the capital structure of every railroad in the United States, copied from public documents of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, during the day several Senators have asked that I obtain unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD this graph on the wall. I have conferred with the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing on the subject, and he is to bring it to the attention of the committee. I hope the joint committee will give its consent to the printing in the RECORD of this graph at an early date next week.

REGULATION OF BANKING

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I find it necessary to comment again on the fact that the Senate banking bill, which has gone to conference with the House, contains within it, in my view, the most important single contribution that can be made to the economic recuperation of the country. I am referring to the provision for immediate Federal bank-deposit insurance. Unfortunately, as the matter proceeds into conference, the amendment which entered the bill upon my primary responsibility is being subjected to a type of criticism in some quarters which either is the result of complete misunderstanding or is born of a desire to prejudice the amendment unduly and improperly and to defeat it by indirection. I serve notice that I shall resist this trend with every resource at my command, and so will other Senators who are like-minded.

There is a type of banking opposition to this insurance formula which I freely concede to be conscientious and sincere. There is another type of banking opposition which is entirely selfish and acquisitive. Without undertaking to identify the two types, because I never care to debate motives, I want to urge that the consideration in the conference and the consideration in the country be upon the basis of facts as they are. I want to urge that realities be the basis of consideration. I want to demonstrate very briefly what I mean by two different contemporary editorials. First is an editorial in the Washington Post of this morning, from which I read two sentences:

> The banking bill was further weakened—

That depends entirely on the point of view, Mr. President—

> The banking bill was further weakened by acceptance of an amendment by Senator VANDENBERG providing for temporary guaranty of deposits up to $2,500.

Then note this language:

> In other words, this is a reversion to the old guaranty scheme that has repeatedly failed when tried by the States.

Mr. President, it is absolutely nothing of the sort. There is scarcely even a remote or indirect relationship between the amendment which I submitted, which the able subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency approved and which the Senate put into the bill by overwhelming vote. The old and advisedly repudiated system of State guaranty failed and fell for three primary reasons—first, because its risks were confined to localized communities, which is an absolute violation of fundamental insurance axioms. In the instance of the insurance amendment which the Senate has approved there is a diversifying decentralized risk spread over all the country. Precisely as a localized fire-insurance company would be involved in an infinitely more difficult responsibility in confronting a localized conflagration than a Nation-wide fire-insurance company would be embarrassed under like circumstances, so the Nation-wide deposit insurance which the Senate has approved is fundamentally and completely and distinctly different in this aspect from the State deposit insurance theory which heretofore has gone by the boards. I make no defense of the former State guaranty laws. On the contrary, I join in condemning them; and I say to the Senate that my pioneering studies of this new Federal proposal all went forward in a full comprehension of these prior failures and a complete purpose to avoid all such infirmities. I insist that the purpose has been completely accomplished in my amendment which the Senate approved.

Secondly, all the State deposit-insurance funds had to collect all their losses in a time of stress virtually by pyramided assessment in a limited time upon the banks involved, because there was not a sufficient credit in the State to permit an amortization of the losses, which is another fundamental principle of insurance.

Under my amendment as the Senate has approved it, there is a distinct limitation upon the immediate assessment that needs to be met in the event of accentuated loss, and there is a provision for the normal, natural amortization of losses over the years.

In the third place, the old and repudiated State systems of deposit insurance failed because they guaranteed all the deposits in the banks and thus reduced all banking to a dead level; whereas under the amendment which the Senate has adopted to provide for immediate deposit insurance in both Federal Reserve member banks and State nonmember banks, the limit of insurance is $2,500 in the deposit.

What is the net result of that discrimination? To the best of our information, there is only 25 percent of the deposits of the country in deposits of $2,500 or less. Therefore, under the plan which the Senate has approved, we are insuring only 25 percent of bank resources, and we are leaving the banker and the depositor upon 75 percent notice to look out what he is doing in respect to his bank and in respect to his deposits. Yet by protecting up to $2,500 we have protected the great mass of depositors in number. We have protected that great mass of depositors, the field in which hysteria usually generates; the field in which the awful social tragedies occur when banks are closed. It is a field which must be protected. The savings of America must be made safe.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Much has been said about the failure of protecting deposits by the various States. The great mistake made there, as I understand as the result of my study of that subject, was that those plans were based upon an assessment on the capital stock of the bank. That often has no relation at all to the deposits. A bank may be capitalized at, say, $50,000, and may have three billions of deposits. The State systems all rested their assessments on the capital of the bank, and that is why they failed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct in making this further distinction. He simply adds to the demonstration of the fact that there is no color of justification for the prejudicial, insinuating suggestion that—is a reversion to the old guaranty scheme that has repeatedly failed when tried by the States.

In other words, this—

The action of the Senate—

No, Mr. President, it is a reversion to solid banking confidence—justified beyond chance of another staggering jolt. It is a reversion to money in banks rather than in hoarding. It is a reversion to a free flow of bank credit and of bank-credit currency as evidenced by checks and similar exchange. It is a reversion, therefore, to stimulated trade and to stimulated employment. It is a reversion to better times. It is the sort of revision for which Congress and the country prays. But it is not a reversion to the more recent jeopardies which have slaughtered deposits and depositors and which must be prevented from recurrence not only in the name of fiscal stability but also in the name of social justice and vigilant democracy.

There is absolutely no relationship whatsoever between the emergency formula which has been developed upon my motion here in the Senate, and which has been almost unanimously approved by the Senate, and these old, repudiated State schemes.

I might add that it has been argued against deposit insurance that there were some losses as a result of the operation of these State schemes. Well, Mr. President, so are there losses—tremendous, challenging losses—on every side today in jurisdictions that never have had any insurance whatsoever. The real question simply is, Who shall stand these losses? I decline to subscribe to the doctrine that the only safe banking in America is banking in which the depositor takes all the major risk. It is possible to create a firm basis of deposit insurance, precisely as the Senate has voted it into the banking bill; and it is my prophecy that if it remains in the bill, if it can weather the storms of conference with the House and the hitherto indicated opposition of even higher Washington authority, it will put steel beams under the confidence of the American people in their banking functions; and, when it does, it will do more to restore a nominal velocity of American business and a normal release of credit than all the rest of the schemes combined which we are undertaking to promote. Indeed, without this steel beam, the balance of the structure entirely falls and fails.

Here is another sentence from this editorial:

State banks would be allowed to participate in this fund on easy terms.

The obvious inference is that there is something about my deposit-insurance formula, which the Senate has approved, which is unreasonably and improperly partial to State banks.

Mr. President, the "easy terms" upon which State banks become eligible for this emergency insurance during the next year are simply the terms of certified solvency. Certified solvency! Any bank in the United States that has certified solvency is entitled to participate on an equality with other banks, whether it is a member of the Federal Reserve System or not. Some of the terms which have been dictated by the Treasury Department and by the Federal Reserve System to State banks during the last 90 dismal banking days, with their needlessly ruthless deflationary policies, have not been reasonable terms; and if, by the phrase "easy terms", it is meant that State banks are at last to have a modicum of a square deal as well as a "new deal", I am very hopeful that "easy terms" means exactly what I have indicated. The country will be better off.

There is another editorial this morning in another newspaper, the Philadelphia Record. This is the other side of the picture. I quote one sentence:

Passage of this bill means more to the small business man, the small bank, and the small depositor than any other legislation that has yet been put through Congress.

I am just as sure that that is true as that I stand in my place upon this floor. That is the thing that is in jeopardy in the conference next week between the House and the Senate in respect to this legislation. I add that the big bank, as a matter of fact, has just as great a stake in this proposition as the little bank because, in the final analysis, there must be justified Nation-wide banking confidence in banking as a whole before any bank, regardless of its size, can be safe.

I quote again from the Philadelphia Record:

The refusal to open over 4,000 banks, after the bank holiday ended, accelerated this trend.

The trend being a depressionary trend. We were particularly victimized in the Chicago Federal System area.

Only 5 percent of the deposits in the 100 largest banks were tied up. But almost 30 percent of deposits in the 17,500 smaller banks were frozen.

Now, mark this:

Foreshadowed was an America without small banks, an America whose credit would be controlled by a few men pulling the strings from New York—the sort of men who weave a net of influence by letting important people in on "favors."

Continuing the editorial:

The Senate and House, by passing bank deposit guaranty bills, have taken the first Government action of this depression to reverse the vicious trend and save small banks.

Now, mark this, because it is the type of verdict which I think the conferees of the House and Senate ought to render, precisely as did the Senate itself on yesterday:

The Record accepts Government guaranty of bank deposits as the only way out. It recognizes the theoretical objections, feels that they are outweighed by the practical benefits in this emergency.

That is true. The editorial is particularly emphatic in its endorsement of my amendment, and I appreciate the compliment, not for myself but for the cause; and this is the concluding phrase in the editorial:

This is the time for liberal sentiment in Congress to strike home for a major victory.

I commend that challenge to the House and Senate conference, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the White House. Mr. President, I know of nothing more important in respect to the economic recuperation to which this administration and this session of Congress are dedicated than that the conference between the House and the Senate shall stand fast for the Senate bill as passed on yesterday, particularly with respect to the provisions for immediate deposit insurance available to all solvent banks on an equality.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial from the Philadelphia Record be printed in full at the conclusion of my observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of Saturday, May 27, 1933]

GUARANTEE BANK DEPOSITS AT ONCE

The Morgan probe has already had one beneficial effect. The Senate was so stirred to anger by the revelations that it rushed through the Glass bill providing for guaranty of bank deposits.

Passage of this bill means more to the small business man, the small bank, and the small depositor than any other legislation that has yet been put through Congress.

Guaranty of bank deposits will give the small banks the weapon they need against the Money Trust, so thoroughly exposed at Washington.

The Money Trust has been concentrating control of American banking in its own hands for half a century. It has systematically crowded out small banks and merged the larger banks into enormous units under its own control.

When the depression began the 100 largest banks controlled almost 50 percent of bank resources in this country.

They have held their ground since, while the small banks have been decapitated by the hundreds. They have not only refused to help the small banks but have stage-managed a deliberate campaign to ruin them in order to "clean up the situation."

Individual initiative in banking, community-contained banking, banking for the independent business man, have been dying during the last 4 years. That has been one of the most perilous results of the depression.

The refusal to open over 4,000 banks after the bank holiday ended accelerated this trend. Only 5 percent of the deposits in the 100 largest banks were tied up. But almost 30 percent of deposits in the 17,500 smaller banks were frozen.

Foreshadowed was an America without small banks, an America whose credit would be controlled by a few men pulling the strings from New York—the sort of men who weave a net of influence by letting important people in on "favors."

The Senate and House, by passing bank deposit guaranty bills, have taken the first Government action of this depression to reverse the vicious trend and save small banks.

The Record accepts Government guaranty of bank deposits as the only way out. It recognizes the theoretical objections, feels that they are outweighed by the practical benefits in this emergency.

The legislation is still in muddled shape.

The Steagall bill, as passed by the House on Tuesday, would not go into effect until July 1, 1934. It would guarantee deposits up to $10,000 in full; deposits from $10,000 to $50,000 would be guaranteed up to 75 percent; above $50,000 to 50 percent. This bill applies—as all bank-guaranty legislation must—not only to Federal Reserve member banks but also to nonmember State banks which can obtain State certificates of solvency.

The Glass bill, as passed by the Senate on Thursday, would, because of a splendid amendment by Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, guarantee deposits up to $2,500 in all sound banks immediately.

On July 1, 1934, this emergency guaranty would give way to the major guaranties, similar to those in the House bill.

The guaranties would be underwritten by a $500,000,000 fund, to be created by a Treasury contribution and a one half of 1 percent assessment on all deposits.

The guaranty project is not on the administration's legislative program. It has been severely criticized by the Treasury.

Lack of Treasury assistance for smaller banks in the past and the Morgan revelations show that Treasury opposition should be completely disregarded.

If the Glass-Vandenberg-Steagall provisions become law, the small banks can fight the large New York interests. They can hold their depositors.

Volume of deposits would increase. Business by credit and check would replace primitive business by cash now going on.

Other provisions in the bill would divorce security affiliates from banks, and prohibit acceptance of deposits by firms doing an investment business—such as J. P. Morgan & Co.

For the sake of the small banks, betrayed by the Treasury, betrayed by the Federal Reserve units, betrayed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, House and Senate conferees should agree on the measure at once, incorporating the immediate Vandenberg guaranty.

This is the time for liberal sentiment in Congress to strike home for a major victory. This is the time to make constructive use of the revelations of the Morgan inquiry.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be considered at this time.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is the pending question. However, he is absent from the Chamber at the moment; and I ask that his amendment may be temporarily laid aside and the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 4, page 6, line 11, after the word "use", by adding the following:

Provided, No route now existing shall be eliminated except with the consent of all participating lines or upon order of the coordinator.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have examined the amendment; and, while I do not know that it is necessary, I think it might be advisable to have the provision in the bill. So I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I understand that there is a desire to reach a final vote on the railroad bill today. If that is the desire, I shall not in any way interfere with it, except to take just a few minutes to make a statement in reference to the bill.

The chairman of the committee made a very exhaustive statement of what the bill contains, and devoted considerable time, with profit to Senators and the country, to a discussion of the various sections of the bill. For that reason it is unnecessary for me to take any time on that phase of the matter. I rise simply to state my sincere concern over the future of transportation by steam lines.

It is a problem that has been before us for years. It is coming to be an aggregation of cumulative problems growing out of confusion which very largely arises out of the multiplication of agencies to transport the traffic of the country. In other words, instead of our suffering from lack of transportation, we are really suffering from a multiplicity of transportation agencies. That has been a subject of much interest to the Congress and to the people at large.

I am not clear as to how the problem is to be solved. I have thought that if the railroads themselves were given more freedom, in all probability they could work out the problem better than we could. There is always, however, a lurking fear that where we allow management full sway the public's interests will be lost sight of; and for that reason we have rather tied down the operators of railroads in the solution of their own problems.

A good example of that is found in the Transportation Act of 1920, in which we made a provision for the consolidation of railroads. Up to that period consolidation had moved normally with tremendous strides. In the case of the New York Central, the Pennsylvania lines, the Baltimore & Ohio, and trunk lines of that order consolidations had proceeded regularly. I think the Pennsylvania lines probably represent 200 or more different lines consolidated into one system. The same statement might be made in reference to the New York Central lines. The Transportation Act was intended to facilitate that; but, unfortunately, it prevented it. Instead of consolidations going on under the aegis of the new legislation, they were virtually stopped. The reason for it was the provision we wrote into the law requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to outline a complete plan of consolidation, and then the consolidations were to proceed on that plan.

The chairman of the committee and all the Members of the Senate know the history of that effort. Four different times in 4 different years the Interstate Commerce Commission has recommended that we repeal the provision requiring a complete plan, because under the law no consolidations could take place until the plan was completed, and they found themselves incompetent to make the plan. When I say "incompetent", I do not mean that as a reflection; I mean that it is a problem which is probably impossible of solution. That is one of the problems facing us now. The first title of this bill is in a way designed to facilitate that particular provision of the law by releasing in a degree the force of the act of 1920. In order to accomplish it, it is rather a temporary feature. We create the office of coordinator, and give the coordinator certain authority, with a tenure of office of a year, with the privilege in the President of continuing him for an additional year. But he is authorized to do certain things. The things he is authorized to do I think are are worth while. I do not like the general idea of giving so much power to one person, but these powers are somewhat limited, and especially limited in time.

The one feature about title I which I think is very unfortunate, and yet I do not know how to avoid it, is that which authorizes the coordinator to make economies, and I fear we proceed to write into the bill handicaps which would make it difficult for him to do the things we authorize him to do. That is a misfortune which grows out of legislation where groups of influences operate with emphasis in writing the law. I am not sure whether there is anything especially to be gotten out of title I at all or not. I am going to vote for it, because it is in the direction of economy and lays down a plan for study, so that in the future certain changes in law may be recommended or, if it be the wisdom of those studying it, not only to change the law but probably to repeal some provisions of the law now operative.

One of the chief functions of the coordinator is to collect a body of facts upon which future legislation might be based, even in the case of reorganization of the financial structure. I listened with considerable interest to what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] stated about the financing. That is the great problem, and it is one that is not a matter of wish, it is a matter of conditions we must meet.

We must maintain the railroads. I am convinced there is no way for our present industrial civilization to subsist without the railroads. I do not think changes in our industrial life will ever obviate the need of steam railroads. I am convinced we must maintain them. I am just as certainly convinced that we cannot maintain them under the present status. They are running at a loss, they cannot keep within their revenue, speaking of them as a whole; and, with the problem of maintaining them under present conditions, when they are not self-supporting, and yet tied down by law that probably makes it impossible for them to support themselves, we are facing a serious problem, and for that reason I will go a long way to do what appears to be necessary to make effective steam-line transportation.

Title 2 is important. I think we are all convinced the recapture clause ought to be repealed. I do not know anybody who is not in favor of that. Shippers favor it, laborers favor it, the managers favor it. That part of it is quite essential.

I cannot see a scintilla of argument against covering holding companies which do transportation with the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. While there has been some lip objection, I cannot see any consistency in objecting to that provision. I think title 2 is quite important. Title I would be important if the purposes could be carried out.

I shall vote for the bill, in the hope that it may be of benefit.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I understand it is agreed that we will temporarily lay aside the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, and I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida proposes to add a new section at the end of the bill, as follows:

That any common carrier proposing an increase in freight, express, or passenger rates shall make an application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for authority to make such increase. Such application shall be heard and passed upon by the Commission not less than 60 days after the application for the increase is made, and at said hearing it shall be incumbent upon the carrier to establish by competent evidence the reasonableness of said proposed increase. That no increase in freight, express, or passenger rates shall be made except when authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission after the hearing herein required. That at least 30 days' public notice shall be given by the Commission of the date upon which such application for increase of rates is to be heard. That at the hearings upon such application the railroad commission or similar State agency of any State, any shipper, grower, or any representative of a shipper or producer, or a group of shippers or producers, shall have the right to be heard and introduce evidence in opposition to the rate increase proposed by the common carrier.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, some recent observations of mine in connection with an increase in freight rates on certain farm products revived my memory at least in regard to the plan under which freight rates at the present time are increased under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

A common carrier now desiring to increase its rates files with the Interstate Commerce Commission a tariff showing the contemplated increase in rates. Without any hearing, without any consideration whatever before the Commission, that contemplated increase automatically becomes effective within 30 days, or, if the Commission desires, it may make an order authorizing the enforcement of that increase even earlier than the expiration of 30 days. No provision whatever is made under which it is incumbent upon the carrier, even if the rate is contested, to establish the reasonableness of the rate.

I believe that the carriers, in possession of all the information upon which they base an application for an increase, being in a position to furnish evidence that their petition for an increase is reasonable, should have upon them the burden of proof when they seek to change, in the nature of an increase, a rate which has previously been in effect and which has previously been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The purpose and object of my amendment is to set up that character of procedure. If we allow it to remain as it is, a farmer, a producer, a manufacturer, a shipper, probably 2 or 3 or 4 weeks after the filing of a tariff is awakened to the fact that he has automatically impending over his head an application for an increase. He has no opportunity to go before the Commission and to have suspended the automatic operation of the regulation or procedure at the present time, unless he himself can disestablish the merits of the application for an increase by placing the burden of proof upon the shipper and the producer, the manufacturer, or whosoever may desire to attack the rate. Under the proposed procedure the burden of proof would be upon the applicant to establish the reasonableness of the rate.

I hope the amendment will be adopted. I am not going to talk at length on this subject. It is a proposition which I attempted to have remedied a great many years ago. I have a copy of a bill I introduced some time ago, but at that time there was very little opportunity in the Congress to get any relief for the people as against the railroad interests of the country. We all know there has been a change in the trend of sentiment of the public on these subjects, and today I believe the average person desires to see the public given fair treatment, and, of course, desires also that the carriers shall have fair treatment. I think their case is pathetic.

I can recall, when I was back in the Florida Legislature, that the transportation companies of this country, and of my own State, were actually tyrannical; they were czars. They attempted to dominate all politics of the State, and to control legislation absolutely. It just happened that I did not belong to the crowd of those who were submissive in that respect, but they were asking no favors, except that they be let alone. The legislation in this country for a quarter or a half century, up to within the last few years, was practically all in the interest of and favorable to the transportation companies of our country. Of course, that was due very largely to the influence that was exercised by them on legislative bodies, and upon citizens, who might write to Mr. Morgan, "I hope some time to be able to reciprocate." We have had too much of that sort of thing in this country all along down through the years, so far as my observation has gone. However, the sentiment is changed now, and is changed because there was a terrible awakening, caused by a terrible disaster to the American people.

I wish to assist the railroads in all reasonable ways, but I do believe that we need a law requiring regulation of the carriers as proposed in this amendment, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, at present the law simply provides that there shall be no change made in rates or fares except on 30 days' published notice, and then there is a proviso that, in their discretion, and for good cause shown, the Commission may make a change on less than 30 days' notice. Then there is a provision that when any proposed change of rates is filed, any person may ask for a hearing, and the Commission may suspend the rate, and may have, I think, several months, something like 7 months, in which to make the decision.

As I understand, the Senator's amendment would change existing law so that the Commission could not allow any increased rates to go into effect in less than 60 days, and would take away some of the discretion which the Commission now has in that regard. The amendment has just been presented to me a few minutes ago. I do not know fully the objections that might be raised to it, but I am willing to accept the amendment and take it to conference with the view to changing it in a satisfactory manner, if it must be changed, or not change it if it seems that it will work no great injustice.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator for the concession, and I hope the conferees will bear in mind the position in which the shippers, the producers, and the manufacturers of this country now are under the present system. The amendment, if adopted, would do no injustice to the railroads, but would do justice to the patrons of the railroads. It would place the burden of proof upon the one seeking a remedy before a governmental tribunal, the remedy being that of increase in freight rates. Somebody has got to pay those freight rates. The railroads ask for them, and the purpose of this amendment is solely to place the burden of proof upon the transportation companies that are best able to furnish the evidence; to require them to establish their cause, instead of shifting the burden and granting the railroads automatically, without any consideration, an increase of rates as is the case under the present regulations. That is all the amendment proposes to do, and I think there is a great deal of justice in it.

While many of the railroads are today, to a pathetic extent, lying stricken upon their backs, at the same time there are certain localities and States within this Union where the railroads pursue their heartless course of the imposition of unreasonable rates instead of pursuing a policy of encouragement and cooperation with the producers in those districts and States.

I am not going into details or enumerate instances and cases within my knowledge coming from my own State, but I know of them, I have them, and I know that the people of my State in the case of a number of freight tariffs need some relief. If they had some relief, they would be able, to a considerable extent, to enlarge their operations and industries, and would, in a large measure, dispel the great amount of unemployment now existing in certain localities; but, on account of excessive rates, both freight and express rates, people who were once prosperous have been driven from their farms into poverty and unemployment.

So, regardless of the pitiful condition of the railroads of the country at the present time, there are many instances in many sections where they still do not, as I see, accord justice on behalf of the producers and shippers, and I hope to bring some assistance to them through this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has just come into the Chamber. His amendment was pending and was laid aside temporarily. I should like to have that amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BLACK is as follows:

On page 6, between lines 4 and 5, add a new paragraph to section 7, as follows:

"That beginning July 1, 1933, 6 hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees. That pending the revision of existing contracts or the making of new contracts between carriers and their employees (in order to provide for the application of the standard of a day's work hereinbefore provided) in the manner required in the Railway Labor Act, neither existing basic rates of pay nor any other measures of compensation as fixed in existing contracts shall be altered except by written agreement of the contracting parties. But in the absence of such an agreement the provisions of this act shall not be construed to authorize any reduction in the compensation of employees subject to this act.

"The act entitled 'An act to establish an 8-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes', approved September 5, 1916, is not hereby repealed, but the operation thereof is hereby suspended so long as the foregoing requirements of this paragraph shall remain in full force and effect."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, let me make a statement, if I may. I am authorized by the President to say that he considers that this 6-hour-day amendment is unworkable as it would be applied under this emergency legislation. He believes that it would be ruinous to the purposes of the bill. I have explained this attitude which he has expressed to me to the representatives of the railroad employees, and, while they favor this amendment and would like to see it adopted, they are anxious to cooperate with the President and not do anything that will seriously interfere with the President's efforts to try to remedy the railroad problem which now confronts the country and the transportation industry. Because of these representations, I understand from the representatives of the railway employees that they are willing to have the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, as is well known, I favor a 6-hour day as a normal day in industry throughout this Nation. I desire to make two or three statements with reference to the situation in connection with this particular amendment.

Some time ago I offered a bill providing for a 6-hour day for railroad employees. There was a division among the railroad employees as to that particular measure. That division, however, was removed several days ago when they agreed upon the amendment which I stated day before yesterday that I would offer as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. President, I do not agree that the 6-hour day is not workable as applied to the railroads. I think it is, and I think it should be adopted. We are told that under the industrial control bill it is the idea that industry in general will adopt the 6-hour day. If that shall prove to be so, industry in general will be working under a 6-hour day, while the railroad employees will be working under an 8-hour day, authorized by law. That I believe to be unfair.

I do not agree, in the next place, that the wages paid to the railroad workers are in any way responsible for the present plight of the railroads. I placed in the RECORD this morning figures showing that that is not the case. I showed, as the statistics themselves show, that the labor cost of operation for 1,000 ton-miles in this country has decreased from the year 1920 to the year 1932 from eighty-two ten-thousandths to fifty-nine ten-thousandths of a cent. It is also true that the fixed charges of the railroads have been gradually going up, while the amount going to railroad employees has been gradually going down. Contrary to the generally accepted idea throughout this Nation, the wage item is not what has brought the railroads to their present plight. Their dividends have increased. I do not mean that many of them are paying dividends this year, but their dividends have increased out of all proportion to their wages.

I want to say, furthermore, that today there are less than 1,000,000 railroad employees while in 1920 there were more than 2,000,000, and the ratio of the fixed charges and dividends to pay rolls was 24.4 in 1920, whereas it has gone up to 50.8 in 1932. That is conclusive proof that the trouble with the railroads is not due to wages.

I am making this preliminary statement by reason of the request that has been made by the railroad brotherhoods.

I do not believe this country is going to get out of its plight until it increases the amount that goes to labor on the farm and in the factory and decreases the amount that goes to the employer and to capital. It is my judgment that any program that fails to take this into consideration will fail. The statistics show that while dividends have been going up wages have been going down. I placed in the RECORD some time ago a statement that showed that the dividends in 1929 were on a basis of 160 as compared with those in 1926, while wages were on a basis of 37, showing the difference.

Mr. President, the particular amendment which I offered was agreed to by the railroad brotherhoods, the 21 organizations; it was brought to me, and it was asked that I offer it as a substitute for the 6-hour day bill which I had previously offered for the benefit of the railroad employees. Under the circumstances, contrary to the views entertained by those who are here representing those 21 railroad organizations who agreed upon this measure, I do not feel justified in offering it as an amendment to this bill. I believe it would be adopted by the Senate and by the House and should become a law.

I still maintain that until we enact real legislation with teeth in it which will bring about a readjustment of economic conditions in this country, so that the people who live on the farm and those who work in the factory and industries generally will receive their just portion of that which is produced from their own efforts, we will never get out of the present economic depression. I still believe that we have got to establish a shorter working day in this country in industry before we will arrive at any actual recovery from present conditions. We cannot depend on a speculative recovery; we cannot depend on an increase in the value of stocks. In order to get out of this depression and to prevent a recurrence, the system must be so operated that the disparity between the wages of capital and the wages of labor will not be so great.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. Speaking of speculation, I just happened to pick up a newspaper and notice that Union Pacific went up 10 points today. That is one of a number of railroads whose stock has been booming largely because of the fact that it was expected this bill would probably pass.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to say with reference to the representatives of the 21 brotherhood organizations that they stated to me that they favor the 6-hour day, and they do not favor it any less today than they did when they brought this amendment to me, which, as they considered it, was a perfected draft of the measure which I previously presented to this body. They believe that there are some provisions in this bill which are absolutely necessary to protect them from the disastrous results that might flow from cutting off thousands more of railroad employees under a merger or consolidation system, and personally I do not feel justified, contrary to their request, to offer this amendment; and therefore I shall not press the amendment to this bill, but I desire it distinctly understood that I favor the amendment; I favor such a law and I do not intend to cease trying to bring about a shorter working day in industry and on the railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Alabama withdraws his amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. BORAH. I desire to make a few remarks.

Mr. DILL. Before the Senator does that I should like to make a request. I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point an excerpt from the report submitted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Senate and House of Representatives on the effect of the 6-hour day in connection with railroad employment.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of Dec. 6, 1932, to the Senate and House of Representatives in response to joint resolution of Congress approved Mar. 15, 1932]

FINDINGS

We are directed by the resolution to report our findings as to "the effect upon operation, service, and expenses of applying the principle of a 6-hour day in the employment of all classes and each particular class of railway employees because of such application." As has been indicated, we have construed the term "railway employees" to include the employees not only of steam railways but also of electric railways, express companies, and sleeping-car companies. The investigation relates to a possible future event, and, therefore, the element of prediction enters in. Methods of operation, speed, and excellence of service, amount of business, and skill in management are among the constantly changing factors which will affect the future. A forecast based on presently available information is all that is possible. We shall make the best forecasts which our judgment permits, indicating in our findings certain important contingencies which may affect their accuracy.

Operation and service: The principle of a 6-hour day can be applied, so far as physical conditions are concerned, without material effect on the operation and service of the several carriers. The effect on expenses, indicated below, might affect operation and service, dependent on revenues. If there were no increase in revenues corresponding to the increase in expenses, the result might be to force abandonment of operation in certain instances, either of entire properties or of parts of properties, through inability to earn operating expenses. Abandonment of entire properties would not be likely to occur, except in the case of certain short-line steam railways and electric railways. In other instances, the effect of insufficient revenues might impair future credit in such a way as to affect operation and service adversely. The latter effect might be overcome in time by improving revenues or by financial reorganizations. We deem it impracticable to forecast the future course of carrier revenues. Obviously, this is dependent upon a great variety of possible factors, by far the most important of which is the economic condition of the country.

Expenses: (a) Assuming the same volume of traffic and operations as in 1930, and assuming no reduction in the then-existing compensation for an 8-hour or other basic day's work, the initial effect would be to increase operating expenses of the carriers collectively, including the express and sleeping-car companies, at the rate of approximately $630,000,000 per year, or about 14.6 percent of the operating expenses and approximately 22.2 percent of the pay-roll expenses in 1930. However, the compensation of steam-railway, express, and sleeping-car employees was on February 1, 1932, reduced 10 percent by an agreement which expires on January 31, 1933. There was no similar blanket reduction in the wages of electric railway employees, but we understand that there have been various reductions in those wages. If the wage reductions are continued, the above estimate of $630,000,000 would be reduced to something less than $570,000,000 per year.

(b) Assuming the same volume of traffic and operations as in 1930 and a reduction in the then-existing compensation pro rata to the reduction in the basic day's work, and excluding road train and engine service from consideration for the reasons given in the preceding discussion, the initial effect would be to decrease operating expenses of the carriers collectively, including the express and sleeping-car companies, at the rate of approximately $26,000,000 per year, or about 0.6 percent of the operating expenses, and approximately 0.9 percent of the pay-roll expenses in 1930. Allowing for the wage reductions above mentioned, this estimate would be reduced to something less than $24,500,000 per year.

It will be noted that in the above findings we assume the "same volume of traffic and operations as in 1930." Regarded from the standpoint of the 10-year period ended with 1931, 1930 was a fairly normal year, but whether it can be regarded as representative of a normal future year remains to be seen. Using the same percentages of operating expense, and assuming the same volume of traffic and operations as in the 12 months ended with September 1932, the initial effect would be an increase at the rate of approximately $414,000,000 per year under the first assumption with reference to wages and a decrease at the rate of approximately $20,000,000 per year under the second assumption. While the reductions in wages were in effect after February 1, 1932, there were also reductions in commodity prices which affected the operating expenses in the 12 months ended with September 1932 as compared with the operating expenses in 1930. We do not as yet have sufficient detailed information in regard to operating expenses in the more recent period to determine whether use of the same percentages as for 1930 produces fair estimates. Changes in operations and methods of performing work, as well as changes in wages, might affect the percentages. Probably, however, the estimates of $414,000,000 and $20,000,000 above given are both somewhat too high, if wage reductions are to be continued.

It will also be noted that in these findings we speak of the "initial effect." It is our belief that the increase in expenses at the outset under the first wage assumption would gradually be lessened and that the decrease in expenses at the outset under the second wage assumption would gradually be increased, as the result of experience with the proposed new arrangement and by technological developments.

It will finally be noted that our estimates, based on the same volume of traffic and operations as in 1930 and the then existing compensation, are somewhat less than those submitted by the carriers. The carriers' estimates of increased expenses, prorated, to operating expenses, were, assuming no reduction in basic day's pay, as follows:

Class I railways and class I switching and terminal companies	$620,438,577
Other steam railways and other switching and terminal companies	21,342,145
Electric railways	23,190,157
Railway Express Agency	24,067,681
Southeastern Express Co	618,373
Pullman Co	12,752,022
Total	702,408,955

Upon the basis of our total estimate of $630,000,000, the above amounts would be substantially as follows:

Class I railways and class I switching and terminal companies	$556,000,000
Other steam railways and other switching and terminal companies	19,000,000
Electric railways	21,500,000
Railway Express Agency	22,000,000
Southeastern Express Co	500,000
Pullman Co	11,000,000
Total	630,000,000

Attention is again called to the fact that these figures are based upon the compensation paid in 1930.

Our reductions are a matter of judgment and are due to the impression which we have gained from the evidence that the carriers have probably underestimated somewhat the rearrangements of work and other expedients which could immediately be employed to limit the effect upon expenses. The reductions are, therefore, more or less arbitrary and cannot be supported by any definite mathematical computation. Experience would, we believe, disclose the practicability of still other rearrangements and expedients, and the amount of added expense, assuming no reduction in basic pay, would also be reduced gradually by the further development of mechanical labor-saving devices and other technological improvements. The added expense would, no doubt, stimulate such development. The only way in which, in our opinion, a more accurate advance estimate could be made of the effect of the application of the principle of a 6-hour day would be by an actual test on some representative railroad or section of a railroad, or by intensive field studies conducted by representatives of the carriers and employees jointly, preferably under the supervision of this Commission.

The effect, so far as expenses are concerned, in the case of each class of employee is sufficiently indicated in the various appendixes, allowing for the fact that we have reduced the carriers' total figures somewhat.

In addition to the effect upon operating expenses, there would be an effect upon construction expenses, insofar as the carriers' employees are used on construction work. Such minor additions to construction expense, however, would have an insignificant effect upon interest charges or dividend payments. Moreover, the amount of construction work which will be done in the future is problematical. At present comparatively little is being done.

Upon either basis of compensation the application of the principle of a 6-hour day would render necessary between 300,000 and 350,000 additional carrier employees in a year such as 1930 and between 60,000 and 100,000 additional employees in a year of abnormal economic conditions such as now exist.

By the Commission.

[SEAL] GEORGE B. MCGINTY, Secretary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I apprehend there will be no roll call on the passage of the bill. It is slated to pass and I have no desire to unnecessarily delay its passage. I wish to state briefly why I vote against the bill. On page 13 of the bill I find in section 10 the following provision:

SEC. 10. (a) The carriers or subsidiaries affected by any order of the Coordinator or Commission made pursuant to this title shall, so long as such order is in effect, be, and they are hereby, relieved from the operation of the antitrust laws, as designated in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, and of all other restraints or prohibitions by law, State or Federal, other than such as are for the protection of the public health or safety, insofar as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by such order made pursuant to this title: Provided, however——

Then there is an exception with reference to the Labor Act. As I understand the provisions, the coordinator may permit any merger or combination or consolidation or any restraint of trade that he may see fit to permit. His order suspends the antitrust laws.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I do not know whether the Senator was here when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] brought up the same question. I called attention then to the fact that the language used here is the same that is in the present law relating to consolidation and pooling arrangements by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BORAH. But a different authority passes upon the question. I regard it as wholly different from present law.

Mr. DILL. But the Interstate Commerce Commission is still authorized to pass on all those acts of the coordinator on appeal by any interested party.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I understand that; that is, in case the parties take an appeal then the Interstate Commerce Commission may pass upon it. After the coordinator has decided upon a merger or consolidation the taxpayer may appeal and get a vast amount of experience for his trouble.

On page 19, in connection with the section which I have just read, I find the following:

(4) (a) It shall be lawful, with the approval and authorization of the Commission, as provided in subdivision (b), for two or more carriers to consolidate or merge their properties, or any part thereof, into one corporation for the ownership, management, and operation of the properties theretofore in separate ownership; or for any carrier, or two or more carriers jointly, to purchase, lease, or contract to operate the properties, or any part thereof, of another; or for any carrier, or two or more carriers jointly, to acquire control of another through purchase of its stock; or for a corporation which is not a carrier to acquire control of two or more carriers through ownership of their stock; or for a corporation which is not a carrier and which has control of one or more carriers to acquire control of another carrier through ownership of its stock.

I am frank to say that I would be glad to be corrected if I am in error, because I have not had the time to consider it that one would like to have. As I understand, under the bill by authority of the coordinator and the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon appeal any combination or any merger may take place which, in their judgment, may be deemed proper; that the Sherman antitrust law and all laws inhibiting combines or monopolies, so far as railroads are concerned, or the ownership of one railroad by another, are suspended if, in the judgment of the coordinator and the Interstate Commerce Commission, it is deemed proper to have it so. That I understand to be the bill.

Mr. President, I am not quite ready to authorize either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the coordinator, or both of them, to authorize any combination which they may see fit to have in this country so far as railroads are concerned.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator is in error when he says that this will broaden the powers of consolidation. The section to which he has referred and which he has read will give the Commission power to control consolidation either by holding companies or by any other means that may be conceived for that purpose. The right of consolidation, the terms of consolidation, as I understand it, are not changed from the present statute, but only the power of the Commission to prevent or at least control consolidation, over which now it has no control because of the creation of holding companies and because of other devices that might be developed which are not touched upon in the law.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not true that if the bill becomes a law the coordinator and the Interstate Commerce Commission may permit any combination or any merger or consolidation between or among the railroads of the country?

Mr. DILL. I would say not; only in their discretion as the public may be interested, and they have that power now. That is a power that now exists.

Mr. BORAH. And from their judgment there is no appeal, as I understand the bill.

Mr. DILL. I may remind the Senator that the Interstate Commerce Commission has outlined certain plans of consolidation. Those plans have been published. There is nothing in the bill that enlarges their power or their right to permit consolidations.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand it, and as I understand those who are interested in the bill, it is that, by authority of the coordinator and the Interstate Commerce Commission, an appeal from any consolidation which they approve is permissible under the laws of the United States, when this bill is enacted into law.

Mr. DILL. There is nothing in it that is not now permissible. The difference between the existing law and this bill is that under the existing law consolidations are being carried out by holding companies which are formed and which are beyond the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, such as the Pennroad and the Alleghany Corporation, which go out and buy railroad stocks and issue securities without any control on the part of the Commission. The reason for amending those sections of the law is not to enlarge the powers of the Commission for consolidation but to give the Commission power to prevent consolidations over which it has no control whatsoever now.

Mr. BORAH. Putting it another way, then, I suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission could authorize the consolidation of two main roads running west. It would be permissible under the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. DILL. It will be permissible just to the extent that it is permissible now under the law. The Senator will recall that about 2 years ago there was a proposal to consolidate the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific, and the Commission did not permit that consolidation.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that; but we are continuing on the statute books the authorization to make any consolidation which appeals to the judgment of the coordinator if no appeal is taken.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer, but I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield. But before doing so may I say there are other questions of great moment presented by the bill, but they are constitutional questions, and I would not offend by discussing constitutional questions in connection with one of these emergency measures.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In the very hurried observation of the measure which I have made it occurs to me that probably this would depend absolutely upon the decision of the coordinator, unless an appeal was taken before the effective date of that order or somebody attacked the order prior to that time. The provision I find in the bill is that if the coordinator makes an order and it is not attacked prior to the date of becoming effective, then the door is closed and the coordinator controls the situation, even without it being reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commission has a right to review it only if the order is attacked prior to the date of its becoming effective. It leaves it absolutely within the control and operation of the coordinator, unless someone attacks it within a period of 20 days.

Mr. DILL. In less than 20 days. No order can go into effect in less than 20 days.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The position taken by the Senator from Idaho, I believe, in consideration of those provisions, possesses even greater merit and force than it did upon the premise upon which he argued that this provision should not be in the bill. I heartily concur with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, fundamentally, as I understand the bill, it authorizes consolidation upon the approval of the coordinator. If the coordinator approves and an appeal is not taken his judgment is a final judgment. In practical effect it will allow the coordinator to permit any combination or consolidation of railroads, and if someone does not see fit to appeal within the time, his judgment alone stands. If someone does appeal, then the Interstate Commerce Commission may review it. That is my understanding. As a practical proposition, as a workable proposition, it authorizes the coordinator to authorize these consolidations and the chances of taking an appeal and reviewing his order are very remote indeed.

Mr. DILL. The last words of the Senator, I think, are hardly justified, because the right of appeal is so broad that I can hardly conceive of any kind of consolidation from which somebody will not appeal.

Mr. BORAH. The shippers, the users of railroads, and that class of people who may be most directly and effectually affected by the order, will be embarrassed to take an appeal under any circumstances and they will hesitate to do so. I do not think consolidation ought to take place upon the judgment of one man dependent for its review upon the proposition that some user of the railroad may see fit to take an appeal.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I understand that in this bill the recapture clause is in effect repealed; that the effect is to acquit the railroads of an indebtedness to the Government of something like $300,000,000 created under the old Transportation Act of 1920 whereby the railroads are supposed to have a certain percentage, and all above that was to be divided between the railroads and the Government, but that in this bill a retroactive provision is carried which releases the claim the Government has against the railroads to the extent of something like $30,000,000.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Commission has estimated it to be $342,000,000, but all of that is in dispute. The rules of valuation have been changed from time to time by the Supreme Court, and every time the Supreme Court changes the rule of valuation then the whole railroad system must be revalued in accordance with new and changing principles which they have written. Every one of the railroads is contesting and opposing the valuations that are being made and changed, and then they propose to carry the matter to the court for review. The law has been in operation for more than 12 years, and in all that time slightly more than $10,000,000 has been paid in. The result is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is in such a maze of confusion, in such a maze of valuation problems, involved in such an almost endless task of trying to work the thing out, that for 3 years they have been asking Congress to repeal the law and put the railroads on some other basis of rate making.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no objection to the provision so far as it may operate in the future, but I do not agree to the plan of arbitrarily releasing a claim of something like $342,000,000, which the Government has against the railroads.

Mr. DILL. But this is not a Government claim. Under the law the money is to be turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission as found to be due, and used by the Commission to assist the weak roads. It does not belong to the Government. It does not belong to the other railroads. It is to be used by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of assisting the weak roads. There again the Commission has never been able to determine just how to use it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not agree, simply because the railroad companies, which were prosperous and made money in prosperous years, are not resisting those claims, that they should thereby be acquitted of them. I simply wanted to express my views with regard to that particular provision in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have a right to the floor. There is no use of attempting to use any such tactics as those to deprive a Senator of the right of expressing himself or presenting an amendment in regard to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that opportunity.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is entirely correct. I had intended to call attention to the same provision, and I do not propose to be excluded from that privilege. Under the rules of the Senate, I have the right.

I move that the bill be amended by striking section 206 from the bill. That is the provision of the bill which provides for refunding to the railroads the money accruing under the recapture clause.

The railroads of this country for months and months and years and years have been knocking at the doors of Congress, seeking to have this money refunded to them; but, standing upon its own merits and as a separate and distinct proposition, they have never before been able to induce a majority of the Senate or of the House to favor any such polisy. Yet in one of these catch-all bills, where we are trying to give them every possible relief, an effort is being made to put this legislation over as part of a measure that may have some commendable features.

I do not think the railroads are entitled to the fund. They should not have it. At the time this recapture clause was enacted Congress was exceedingly liberal with the common carriers of the country—so liberal and generous in regard to the percentage of return it permitted them to make, and the rates they were permitted to promulgate, that a good many Senators who were here at the time, including myself, voted against the bill. That bill provided, according to my recollection, that the railroads were entitled to earnings of 5 percent. Prior to that time, the history of the railroads of the country, at least for a number of years, had been that upon their gross capitalization or valuation they had not made over 2 or 2½ percent. But Congress in its generosity after the war, many of its Members desiring to see the railroads prosper, and prosper at the expense of the producers and of the industries of our country generally, enacted a law giving them the right to increase their rates to the extent of 5 percent net. The result was that throughout the country the rates were raised anywhere from 30 or 40 percent to as much as 100 percent within 60 days after the enactment of that law.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. When we were dealing so generously with the railroads——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana to pardon me a minute.

When we were dealing so generously with the railroads, and passing a law—which I did not vote for, I am glad to say—giving the railroads everything they wanted upon their return to private ownership, 80 or 90 percent of it, a railroad-written and railroad-prepared bill, they said they were willing to have this recapture clause inserted in the bill. If they could make that percentage of earning they had no objection to giving back to the Commission a certain percentage over and above that amount.

The railroads went ahead and enjoyed their prosperity, and I am glad of it. I am sorry, however, that their prosperity resulted from the charging of excessive rates to a large part of the people of the country. They did enjoy their handsome incomes, however, their splendid dividends, for a number of years. The railroads of America were exceedingly prosperous for a period of some 10 or 12 years after the enactment of that beneficent law, known as the "Esch-Cummins law", in behalf of the railroads. Now, after they have received their benefits, after they harvested their fruits under that beneficent law, as they did for years and years, I do not think there is any equity or justice in turning back this money to the railroads of this country; and I therefore move to strike out that section of the bill.

I may be mistaken, but I refer more particularly to paragraph (a). As to paragraph (b), I should like to know from the chairman of the committee what that means in regard to having a new set-up as to war profits and excess profits and one thing and another made by the railroads.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Florida that that paragraph was inserted by the committee because if this money was to be returned to the railroads they ought to be charged taxes on it, for they have paid no taxes, on the theory that it was being collected by the Government. Yesterday, however, the Senate did not agree to that amendment, for the reason that it might be considered a revenue-producing amendment, and thereby cause the House to reject the bill; so that has gone out.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then my motion to amend by striking out section 206 applies only to the matter I have discussed.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into any lengthy argument on this subject, but I wish to call attention to the fact that for the past 2 or 3 years the Interstate Commerce Commission has recommended the repeal of section 15a, both as to the future and retroactively, and that, so far as I know, none of those who are connected or actively associated with the railroads are opposing that repeal.

This provision is favored by the shippers; it is favored by the railroads; it is favored by the State railway commissions; it is favored by the representatives of the railroad employees; and it is favored by the security holders.

The present rate-making rule has been the most unsatisfactory part of the Interstate Commerce Act. The Senator himself has testified to the objections to that rule. If we repeal this recapture section, we find the Interstate Commerce Commission with about $13,000,000 in its possession, a little over $10,000,000 having been received from the railroads and invested in Government obligations, the interest on them being sufficient to raise the amount to $13,000,000. We then have the claims of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the railroads, which, as I said awhile ago, must be litigated; but before they can be litigated the Interstate Commerce Commission must go on spending I do not know how many millions of dollars working out a change in the valuations resulting from the recent decision of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. case, where the court changed the rule of valuation from the rule laid down in the O'Fallon case.

The railroads have pending an appeal from the valuation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. case, and nobody knows what the Court will decide about that. As we look into this situation, there is nothing ahead but literally years of expenditure of money by the Interstate Commerce Commission, first to determine the valuations in accordance with the rule of the Supreme Court, which seems to change every time the personnel of the Court changes, and then in the litigation that will follow by the railroads fighting against the claim that is made. Then, when we have won the suit, if we do win it, and we go to collect the money, unless the financial conditions of the railroads improve there will not be any money with which to pay the amount, and they will have to borrow money to do so.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. On this question of valuation, if we give the railroad back all of this money, the valuation stops, does it?

Mr. DILL. Yes; that is, the present method of valuation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the Commission have to have a system of valuation for the ascertainment of the value of the property for rate-fixing purposes?

Mr. DILL. Yes; but the difference is this: The valuation now must be kept up to date every year. It must be reviewed every year for the purpose of determining whether or not, under the new valuation of that year, the railroads will be getting more than 5¾ percent on their valuation. The rule of valuation is much broader under the new rate-making provision, and the Commission has much more freedom and discretion in making rates than it has under section 15a.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It strikes me that if we have to maintain a system of valuation anyway for rate-making purposes, and that will not be discontinued by giving the railroads three or four hundred million dollars, we might let the claim remain in statu quo, instead of giving them the three or four hundred million dollars at the present time. That is what I want to do—let it stay in statu quo.

Mr. DILL. Of course, we will not be giving them any money, because there is not any money to give them. They have never paid any money except the $10,000,000. They have not paid the $300,000,000, and they are contesting every dollar of it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. We will give them, though, what the Government believes to be a claim of approximately $340,000,000.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. We wipe the slate and give that to them. The Government contends that the amount is about $340,000,000.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator that in the O'Fallon case the Government lost. We did not win that suit, and it has gone back for revaluation. It has not been settled yet.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If that is true, what is the necessity of making a specific provision in this bill to give it to them?

Mr. DILL. Simply to put a stop to the endless fight over valuations and over this claim proposition.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have been impressed that the fight has been principally on the part of the railroads trying to be relieved of this honest debt, which they agreed to when Congress passed the character of legislation that they wanted following the war.

Mr. DILL. Of course this provision was not put in at the request of the railroads. It was put in at the request and suggestion of the security holders.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I know what it was, of course. The security holders probably stood just as high with Congress as the railroads. Security holders usually get about what they want in the way of legislation.

Mr. DILL. The truth of the matter is that this method of making rates was never advocated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, by the railroads, by the shippers, by the employees, or by anybody except the security holders. It is a theory which has proved most unsatisfactory from the hour it was first adopted.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The thing that proved very unsatisfactory to most of the 120,000,000 American people about the theory in the particular bill of which this provision was a part was that Congress allowed the railroads to make rates that were excessive, and they made profits that were excessive for a certain length of time, and flourished as the green bay tree for a number of years under the liberal provisions for rate making which Congress granted them. So the principal complaint I ever heard of was from the people who had to suffer under the burden of excessive rates as the result of that litigation.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator that in the 12 years, taking it all together, the amount involved is an average of less than $30,000,000 a year.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This was a part of that legislation. This, no doubt, was an inducement for a number, at least, of Senators and Congressmen to support the legislation. However, I did not support the legislation. I did not care to support legislation that was going to allow an excessive rate of return upon railroad stocks when we knew, everybody that had ever observed or cared to see—of course, nobody is so blind as the man who does not want to see—that the railroad stocks of the country were largely watered. We had before us then, even more vividly than we have now, the methods of Harriman in building and pyramiding his millions upon millions by watered-stock railroads; and yet we allowed them as much as 5 percent then on all that stock. This provision was a part of that legislation; and, as I say, I dare say that this provision, at least on the part of those who prepared the measure in the main, was placed there for the purpose of catching some votes that they did not think they would get unless they had a provision of this character in the bill.

I do not think it is just right, now, to dump over into their laps the claim of $342,000,000. That is the reason why I have made the motion to strike this section from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I desire at this time to call up two amendments that have been printed and are on the desk of the Presiding Officer.

I ask to have the first amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, line 19, immediately before the period, it is proposed to insert a comma and the following:

> And shall afford the State commission or Governor so notified reasonable opportunity to present views and information bearing upon such contemplated order.

Mr. DUFFY. I understand the Senator in charge of the bill is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this is an amendment simply to give notice to the Governor or the State commission that they may be given opportunity to present their views. I do not see any objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUFFY. I propose a second amendment, Mr. President, which I ask to have reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, line 17, immediately before the period, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to insert a comma and the following:

But no such order shall operate to relieve any carrier from the effect of any State law or of any order of a State commission made thereafter.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, the section provides:

This title shall cease to have effect at the end of 1 year after the effective date, unless extended by a proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof, but orders of the coordinator or of the Commission made thereunder shall continue in effect until vacated by the Commission or set aside by other lawful authority.

What I am trying to reach is this: In Wisconsin we have, and have had for many years, an effective railroad commission, now called the public-service commission. Many other States likewise have very efficient commissions. There are many problems coming up of local concern, and it seems to me it might well be that, after the period of this emergency is over, they might not be in a position where they would be able to give orders in a comparatively local situation without coming down to Washington and getting some relief.

It has been suggested that perhaps the language of the amendment I propose is too broad. I have no particular desire to have any certain words used, as long as it will liberalize the bill as it now appears after the period of the emergency is over.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] had a suggestion to make as to changing the language of the proposed amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, on further consideration it seems to me that this is an unworkable amendment, for the reason that if the amendment is adopted the railroads will be in this position: The orders of the coordinator will be obeyed after the act expires, except as they may interfere with the order of a State commission or some State law. It seems to me that that makes it unworkable. We cannot do that. We either must make all of the order cease to have effect or we must not have any part of it cease to have effect. It seems to me the amendment is not a workable amendment when applied to this part of the bill, and I do not see how the amendment can be adopted without interfering with the operation of the bill.

Mr. DUFFY. It is an amendment that is desired by the Association of Public Service Utilities Commissions, as I understand it. I was so informed.

Mr. DILL. I think that is a part of their proposal, that none of these orders shall remain in effect after this title is no longer in effect. In other words, I think they want it so that none of these orders shall continue in effect, but the committee has retained the language of the bill so that all of these orders shall remain in effect until changed by the commission or set aside by some lawful authority.

Mr. DUFFY. Then what would be the situation? Is the State commission to be rendered powerless for all time to come, unless they come down here to Washington and get authority from the proper official?

Mr. DILL. No; the only other lawful authority, of course, will be Congress. They might come to the Commission and get relief, if they could show a sufficient need. But I hope the Senator sees my objection, namely, that either all of the order must cease to be effective or all of it must continue. We can hardly pick out certain parts of the order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What is the understanding of the Senator from Washington as to the power the State commission would have under the law?

Mr. DILL. They cannot interfere with an order of the coordinator or of the Commission, under this measure.

Mr. LONG. It would wipe out the laws of the State?

Mr. DILL. So far as it might affect them. The Commission has that power at the present time.

Mr. LONG. The Senator means over interstate matters.

Mr. DILL. Over all matters of consolidation.

Mr. LONG. Is not the coordinator's power a good deal broader than just over consolidations, under this language?

Mr. DILL. Probably.

Mr. LONG. As I understand it, these executive committees, under the coordinator's jurisdiction, may, with his approval, ignore all State orders and State regulations and State laws?

Mr. DILL. I think not, except as to interstate traffic, and the Commission can do that now.

Mr. LONG. They are taking over the res, the thing itself.

I do not want to take the floor away from the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the debate. The issue is very clear. I think the State commissions should not be precluded for all time to come, as long as these orders of the coordinator are not set aside. It would prevent State commissions from giving the relief they might now give. I think that is improper, after the period of the emergency is over. I do not care to prolong the discussion any more than stating that fact, and asking that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I must confess an ignorance in this matter for which I cannot be excused. I was on the committee, but was unable to attend many of the sessions.

I had received the impression—I do not know how—that an amendment had been drawn, or that it was thought an amendment would be drawn, to protect the authority of the States under this proposed law. But, judging from the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin has offered this amendment, evidently no such thing has been done.

I believe I can turn to the section I had in mind, which I want to read. On page 14 of the proposed law, paragraph (b), this language appears:

(b) The Coordinaor shall issue no order which shall have the effect of relieving any carrier or subsidiary from the operation of the law of any State or of any order of any State commission until he has advised the State commission of said State, or the governor of said State if there be no such commission, that such order is in contemplation.

I had hastily run through the measure, intending to bring the matter up; but as I read it we are doing away with State laws and State commissions. I do not see anything else this measure does, because, differing from the way the Interstate Commerce Commission has control over the matter of interstate rates, this measure would give the coordinator all control over the railroad itself, and therefore his orders would be above the laws of the State and the State commission's orders.

I had understood that the State railroad commissions had been satisfied on that matter, and I had paid little attention to it. Having been a member of a State board, I thought perhaps they would have said something to me about it; but apparently nothing has been done, and this bill in its present shape is going through, divesting all laws of a State of any effect whatever.

Mr. President, in the States there are grade crossing laws, there are yard limit laws, there are State laws as to depots, and there are State laws as to the keeping of passenger stations, waiting rooms, railroad crossings, and so on, not to say anything of freight rates interchanged with water rates. Every law on the statute books in the States will be wiped out by the authority given into the hands of one man to annul all the laws in 48 States.

Mr. President, unless the proposed amendment is adopted, this will be a very objectionable bill. As a matter of fact, the bill ought never to have been brought into the Congress. It is not going to do any good. The sentiment of labor has been against it until recently they were persuaded by some mysterious move to say that they were for it. Only a day or so ago they indicated that position, the Senator from Washington tells us. I am also told that even the railroads themselves are not enthusiastic about the bill. They do not think it is going to do any good. The kind of economies it would result in would be of very little value, and about the only benefit that would accrue to the railroads from the bill would be through giving them back the recaptured money. A law was enacted in 1920, and included in that law was a provision by which the short-line railroads might be assisted, the provision being that when the railroads made more than 5½ or 6 percent, the surplus earnings should be impounded by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and thereafter expended to build up the short-line railroads.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I should like to send up to the desk a modification of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the modification.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is modified to read as follows:

On page 18, line 17, immediately before the period, to insert a comma and the following:

"But notwithstanding the provision of section 10, no such order shall operate to relieve any carrier or subsidiary from the effect of any State law or of any order of a State commission made after this title ceases to have effect."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. DILL. As I understand it, with that language in the law, the State legislatures and the State commissions could make orders setting aside or affecting orders made after this period of emergency was over. It would not interfere during the period of the act, but afterward they could make orders.

Mr. LONG. After the year?

Mr. DILL. After the year.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, perhaps the amendment originally introduced did not go far enough. As I understand it, the modified amendment would leave the State commissions nugatory during the pendency of the law.

Mr. DILL. Yes; because otherwise they would not be able to make their orders. But the objection of the State commissions was that, at the end of this period, they would have no method of changing objectionable things, and this amendment would make it permissible for them to do that. That was their principal objection.

Mr. LONG. The Senate may proceed and adopt the pending amendment, and then I shall offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee about one matter in the bill. Section 16 as it has been amended provides that the title shall cease to have effect at the end of 1 year after the effective date, and further provides that orders of the coordinator or of the Commission made thereunder shall continue in effect until vacated by the commission of the State or set aside by other lawful authority.

Then in subdivision (4) of the following section there is a provision for the consolidation and merger of the properties of two or more carriers.

Under subdivision (a), section 201, there might be a merger of two or a dozen railroads, and even though the act should become ineffective by expiration, as provided here, that merger would go on perpetually.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, that is the present law. We have copied the present law. The present law authorizes the Commission to make those consolidations at the present time.

Mr. BONE. Then this does not change the existing statute?

Mr. DILL. No; not in that respect.

Mr. LONG. I propose an amendment to the bill. I will move to put the amendment at the end of the measure, or I can put it on page 14, line 19, after the word "contemplation." I move to insert the following——

Mr. DUFFY. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there has been an amendment just adopted after the word "order", in line 19, in which the word "contemplation" occurs.

Mr. LONG. Then, I will move to insert the amendment at the end of the bill. I propose to add a new section to read as follows:

The laws of the several States and orders of the commissions of the several States already in existence and hereafter enacted shall remain in effect unless the same shall be interstate in character.

The wording, Mr. President, may need a little revision, but that can be done in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have not had the opportunity, because of being in committees all day, to listen to the debate on the pending measure nor fully to understand the position of the Senator from Louisiana; but, as I understand, the amendment which he has just suggested has for its object the noninterference by this proposed act with the power and authority of the States which they inherently possess to deal with matters which are within their jurisdiction?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; such as railroad crossings and water coolers in depots, and heat in waiting rooms in the wintertime, all of which are maintained by reason of State orders and State laws, and we would not have any of them today if they had been left to the railroads.

Mr. KING. The amendment, if adopted, would mean, then, that nothing in this proposed act shall be construed to repeal or modify the regulations or laws enacted by any State or by its utilities commission?

Mr. LONG. By the order of its commission. That is what it means. I wish to say, Mr. President, that we are going mighty far here. I am sorry that I did not understand this sooner, and I want the Senate to pause a minute and understand before they wipe out about ten or fifteen thousand laws that are on the statute books of the 48 States of the Union. The railroads themselves organize regional committees in accordance with the mileage of the railroads; and those regional committees are given the right to run things subject to the approval of the coordinator, which ninety-nine times out of one hundred or nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of one thousand means that the regional committees are going to run things as they please. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] suggests that the amendment be now read, and I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill a new section to read as follows:

SEC. 19. The laws of the several States and orders of the commissions of the several States already in existence and hereafter enacted shall remain in effect unless the orders affecting them relate to interstate commerce.

Mr. DILL. They would have that right, anyway.

Mr. LONG. I think so. I think I can say that the amendment is all right. Will the Senator from Washington accept it?

Mr. DILL. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the clerk's desk, and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 27, line 19, after the word "service", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no such rate shall be greater than will be sufficient to produce a fair and reasonable return upon the prudent investment in the property, less depreciation, or upon an investment necessary to reproduce the property.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this bill sets up a new method of fixing rates. Heretofore there have been two outstanding theories; one that a rate should be sufficient to produce a reasonable return upon an amount of money that would be necessary to reproduce the property, the prudent investment theory it is called; the other is that the rate should be sufficient to produce a reasonable return upon the investment in the property.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think the Senator misstates his own meaning. He means, in the one case, upon prudent investment, and in the other upon the reproduction cost.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is what I thought I said, and I thank the Senator for the correction.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the adjustment of rates upon either one of these theories, standing alone, might get us into difficulty and bring about an unfair rate. When the value of materials and labor and other things necessary to go into the building of a railroad is on the increase and is higher than it was when the investment was made, naturally it is to the interest of the carrier company to be able to get a return upon the necessary investment to reproduce the property. If the cost of material and labor is less than when the property was constructed, then the opposite is true. It is not unfair, as I look at it, to prohibit the making of a rate not in conformity with the provisions of the amendment. In other words, if a railroad were built 25 years ago at a cost of $25,000,000 and we were now fixing a rate and found that at the present time it would cost $50,000,000 to reproduce it, it would follow, it seems to me, that if those who own the railroad should get a return upon $50,000,000 investment they would be getting a return entirely out of proportion to the investment which they had made originally. On the other hand, if a railroad built 20 years ago has gone down so that its present value is less than what it originally cost, if it originally cost $50,000,000 to build it, and it is now worth only $25,000,000, the people of the country who have to use the railroad ought not to be required to pay a rate or charge that would bring a return on a greater amount than the present value of the railroad. It would never do an injury, it seems, to anyone to couple the two together, as I have done in this amendment. It would also bring a fair return if the principle were properly applied. Personally I can not see any objection to limiting the rate of return to a combination of those two principles.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I believe that today the railroads themselves will welcome the amendment the Senator has offered. While they worked so hard to get the reproduction-cost theory, now that prices have gone down I think they would like to land themselves on a sound bottom.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; one can take either horn of the dilemma he wants to, but a railroad could not get a higher rate than is provided by either one of these bases of valuation. In other words, what the Commisison ought to do, and would do, would be to say, "What is this railroad now worth?" and also, "How much is invested in this railroad?" It would fix the rate on the least of those two items.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I have just read the Senator's amendment and should like to understand it clearly. I am not clear as to what the Senator's purpose is. He says on the "prudent investment * * * less depreciation", or upon reproduction cost. Do I understand that he means to allow the Commission the alternative of selecting which basis it will take or that it must take?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. As I understand, the amendment does not do that. The Commission must take the one that is the least. It cannot be more than this; it cannot be more than that. It cannot be more, in other words, than a return on the reproduction value; and it cannot be more than a return on the investment in the property.

Mr. DILL. That is what I want to have made clear; and if that is the Senator's meaning, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, after the amendment of Mr. DUFFY, at the end of line 19, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 11. Nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any railroad company from any contractual obligation which it may have assumed with regard to the location or maintenance of offices, shops, or other facilities at any point, and all rights under any such contract shall remain unimpaired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean by that that specific performance may be compelled when it was discovered that it would be wise to abandon some contract and to pay damages?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Utah I am not trying to effect any change in the status quo; I just do not want this bill to interfere with any contractual rights; they can settle those rights either by specific performance or by damages; but I want to make it clear that this measure does not give the coordinator or the companies any authority which they do not possess at this time.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think that it would be possible, even without his amendment, for the coordinator or the Commission to do anything that would interfere with existing contracts?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that in my State there have been one or two cases in which the railroad company contracted, when it was being built, to locate and maintain in perpetuity shops and offices in consideration of the grant of lands or money or other considerations. Attempts have been made by the companies to move those shops and abrogate those contracts. Those cases have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the cities have been successful in their contention. From time to time they renew their attempts through the Interstate Commerce Commission to secure the abrogation of those contracts. I hope the Senator from Washington will accept the amendment.

Mr. DILL. I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator from Washington will not object to it.

Mr. DILL. It seems to me the Supreme Court rulings themselves would make it impossible for an order of that kind to be issued. I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, it seems to me it should be adopted. Certainly, obligations which have been entered into between transportation companies and States or municipalities should be fulfilled. The Federal Government could not be a party to the repudiation of contracts entered into by agencies or organizations over which it exercises direct or indirect supervision or control.

Mr. President, I regret not having had opportunity to carefully examine the measure before us or read the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. In the consideration of the bill since it has been before the Senate I have been unable to be present except for a few minutes, owing to important committee engagements which compel my attendance. Owing to the large number of important measures which have been under consideration during this extraordinary session, it has been impossible for Senators to familiarize themselves with the same. Many Senators are compelled to be in attendance at committee meetings of importance during hours when the Senate is in session, and the result is that in the consideration of some measures which have been before the Senate during this session only a limited number of Senators have been present. It may also be said that the hearings upon important bills have not been as exhaustive as they should have been and have not elicited pertinent facts essential to a proper understanding of the full significance and implications of such measures.

Some of the bills that have been presented to the Senate for consideration are of vital importance. They deal with questions out of the ordinary and, in the view of many, enter fields for which warrant may not be found under our form of government. Policies which deal with economic questions are correlated with political principles, and it is a trite statement that political policies are largely determined by economic policies. I have upon a number of occasions questioned the wisdom of measures which concededly are at variance with economic and political views under which our Nation has reached the importance, if not crowning position, which it occupies among the nations of the earth. In this period of unrest perhaps changes are inevitable. Accepted canons of political and economic conduct are either repudiated or materially modified.

It is to be expected, of course, that political institutions and economic conditions cannot be static or petrified; but changes do not always bring about improvement or are indicative of progress. The Constitution of the United States is sufficiently flexible to meet salutary changes and legitimate and proper evolutionary growth or development. It is not necessary to be iconoclasts in order to tread the highway of economic and political progress. There are those among us who look with disfavor upon political principles bequeathed by the fathers of this Republic and who desire the introduction of alien policies into our social, economic, and political system. Socialism has its devotees; bureaucracy, its faithful adherents; and fascism is not without protagonists. In periods of economic distress, of business depression, and of unemployment there are serious challenges to the existing order and to sound and wise policies which must be followed if the highest forms of civilization are attained.

Not infrequently the statement is heard that we are upon the eve of a social revolution; that the old order is to perish and a new form of government is to be established. The view is entertained by some that the day of individual initiative is past, and that agencies and instrumentalities set up by the governing political authority possess virtues and prescience and infallibility which are denied to individuals, under the guidance of which the problems and difficulties encountered in the economic, social, and political life of the people will be eliminated. Russia has its autocratic authority and each individual is chained to the position to which he or she is allocated. Fascism and socialism are engaged in a formidable struggle to determine which shall triumph. Democratic institutions are menaced here and elsewhere. The word "dictator" is not infrequently heard in this Republic, and apologists appear in defense of propositions to confer authority inconsistent with democratic ideals which have for more than 150 years obtained in this Republic.

The mistakes of capital and the indefensible conduct of some holding high places in the financial world create resentments, and by some are being used to justify powerful assaults upon our political and economic system. No form of government is perfect, and democracy is to be charged with serious mistakes. Undoubtedly there is a world-wide struggle between democratic forces and those which seek autocratic power. This Republic has been an inspiration to peoples in many lands and they have sought to establish political as well as economic systems which would approximate in form and achievement the United States. These observations perhaps are not pertinent to the bill under consideration, but they are prompted by the confused currents of thought which we encounter in nearly every part of the land.

Mr. President, with reference to the bill under consideration, I have reached the conclusion that the situation does not require its passage. That there should be legislation dealing with the problems of transportation there can be no doubt. I was greatly pleased with the admirable address delivered by President Roosevelt at Salt Lake City during the recent campaign. His speech demonstrated that he appreciated the necessity of legislation to meet in a comprehensive way the questions involved in our transportation systems. The bill before us does not meet the situation or cover the field embraced in the President's address. The President has indicated that he is not ready to make recommendations of a full and comprehensive character in dealing with our transportation problems. The measure before us is a makeshift, and I fear that it will prove embarrassing when we come to deal in a broad and comprehensive way with the railroad situation. Conditions undoubtedly will arise under the operations of the pending measure that will make it more difficult to deal comprehensively and justly with the transportation problems when Congress meets in January.

There are evidences of improvement upon the part of the railroads. It is true that many of them are in a precarious situation, but it is not certain that this measure will bring the relief which they require. As I view this measure, it will add to the perplexities and confusion existing today in our transportation system. Instead of unifying authority and promoting efficiency it will produce the opposite result. The new agencies set up will certainly make for divided authority, and the creation of the so-called "coordinator" will add to the uncertainties and tend to prevent improvements and economies which otherwise would be put into effect.

There will be conflicts of authority which will inevitably result in confusion and impediments to the inauguration of reforms which otherwise would follow under the administration of transportation units. As I understand this bill, it does not deal fairly and justly with the employees of the railroads, nor will it be entirely fair to the owners of the railroads or those holding their securities. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have great authority in dealing with the railroads; they are conversant with their condition and alive to the reforms needed and to the rights not only of the stockholders and the public but also of the employees.

I fear that this measure is a step in the direction of governmental ownership and operation of the railroads of the United States. It cannot be denied that some of the policies of the Government in connection with the railroads have tended in the direction of governmental ownership. It is inevitable that when the Government takes supervision over any branch of industry it strengthens the demand for increased governmental supervision and ownership. There are demands being made for the Government to take over and own and operate the key industries of the United States; and, I repeat, that the bill before us will increase the demands for governmental ownership of the railroads of our country. Demands are being made not only for a railroad dictator but for an oil dictator. These demands are significant of a new movement in our economic and political life. More and more the people are looking to the Government to assume duties and responsibilities which rest upon them or upon local communities or upon the States. More and more power is being transferred to the Federal Government and the functions and the authority of the Government are being augmented. It is to be hoped that there will be no political dictatorship, and that the confused condition existing today will not lead the American people from the paths of safety and to an abandonment of those sound political principles which have been transmitted by our fathers.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator's objection extend to title II as well as to title I?

Mr. KING. Yes, to both titles. I make this answer in the light of broad and comprehensive legislation to deal with the railroad situation which is expected at the next session of Congress. There is a growing demand for legislation dealing with water transportation, with trucks and with motor transportation, as well as with the railroads. The entire question must receive attention at the next session of Congress, and I have no doubt that it is the intention of the President to submit to Congress in January recommendations for legislation to meet the situation.

Mr. FESS. I had been under the impression that title I had been the subject of the criticism which the Senator is making.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps my remarks have been directed rather to title I than to title II, but I am resting my opposition to the bill largely upon the ground that we are not dealing with the question in a broad and satisfactory way; that the proposed measure does not deal with it in a proper and comprehensive way. Congress will have to disregard many and, indeed, repeal provisions found in the bill before us. Because the bill before us does not meet the situation and will, in my opinion, result in confusion and constitute obstacles to normal development which would go forward under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commisison, I shall not vote for its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and is still open to amendment. If there be no further amendments, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAX EXEMPTION

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Star and Times of May 19 entitled "End the Tax Exemption." It is a very interesting editorial. Immediately preceding it, I desire to read the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, so that it may appear just ahead of the editorial. That amendment to the Constitution reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Star and Times of May 19, 1933]

END THE TAX EXEMPTION

Budget Director Douglas has submitted to Congress four alternative tax plans for paying interest on the $3,300,000,000 public-works program. President Roosevelt, a little earlier, said that if none of the plans proved acceptable, he would offer one of his own.

This implies that Mr. Roosevelt has a tax plan outside the four. He should have. Not one of the four is likely to be, or should be, accepted by Congress when other and better sources of revenue lie untapped.

Mr. Douglas offers three plans, all of which include large increases in the normal income tax, plus various consumption taxes levied without regard to ability to pay. The fourth is the iniquitous general sales tax.

Not one of these four plans levies one cent of taxation upon the superincomes of the Nation, which are still taxed far below their war-time levels.

It is inconceivable that Congress will accept any of the proposals coming from Mr. Douglas. One might almost believe the taxes were deliberately chosen to insure their rejection, after which Mr. Roosevelt will himself propose the kind of a tax that ought to be levied.

What is that tax?

There is no doubt about what ought to be done. This is the time and the opportunity to get rid of the greatest tax fraud in the United States, the exemption from the income tax of income derived from interest on "tax-exempt securities."

Whenever this is proposed it is said, "That requires a constitutional amendment."

It requires nothing of the sort. It requires an income tax law written in the exact wording of the United States Constitution. Why do we have this exemption from the income tax? In purpose and effect today, it exists to give men with incomes of $500,000 a year and up a chance to dodge the higher brackets of the income surtax. Why do we have this exemption in our so-called "constitutional law"? We have it because, years ago, a reactionary Supreme Court seized upon a poorly worded statute as an excuse to hold that Congress had no power to levy an income tax upon income derived from State and municipal bonds.

The sixteenth amendment to the Constitution gives Congress power to levy a tax "on incomes from whatever source derived." All that is needed is to pass a law levying a tax of certain specified rates upon "incomes from whatever source derived", and exemption ends. The tax upon income derived from State bonds would then be demanded by the Treasury, and any objecting taxpayer could resist in court.

It is an axiom of law that phrases which are not ambiguous do not have to be construed. There is nothing ambiguous about the sixteenth amendment.

What could a new constitutional amendment say? It would have to give Congress power to levy a tax on "incomes from whatever sources derived, including interest on State and municipal bonds." That would be like levying a tax on "all cereals, including corn."

The question of levying an income tax on all incomes has never been put squarely up to the Supreme Court. It has never been put up to the present liberalized Supreme Court at all. The old decision which gave the surtax dodgers this hole to hide in was not based upon the sixteenth amendment itself, but upon a warped interpretation of the wording of the income tax law. That decision wouldn't have had a leg to stand on if Congress had taken the plain wording of the sixteenth amendment and written it into the law. There isn't one chance in ten that the present Supreme Court would nullify a properly worded law ending this long and notorious evasion of the income-tax principle.

The constitutional objection to taxing income from State bonds is valid only when it is a discrimination against State bonds. It is no discrimination when all sources of income are taxed alike, and no injury to the States.

Within 2 years the Supreme Court has squarely reversed the principle of the old tax-exemption decision in a case coming to it from California. Then why should Congress hesitate? The Supreme Court has virtually invited it to act.

Why beat around the bush looking for rabbits when there is a bear in the open?

Why load more taxes onto the man with a little income, onto every man who buys a gallon of gasoline, onto every man or woman who drinks a cup of tea or coffee, when billions of dollars of absolutely tax-free wealth are concentrated in the hands of a few men protected by an outworn decision of an outdated bench?

The Constitution is clear. Make the act of Congress as clear as the Constitution and the income surtax-dodging racket will end. For more than 15 years it has been the crowning shame of the American tax system. The time has come to get rid of it.

THE SHIPPING BOARD

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed to the Honorable WALLACE H. WHITE, junior Senator from Maine, by Mr. John Nicolson concerning Shipping Board matters. I have spoken to the Senator from Maine about the matter, and he has given his consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed to the Hon. WALLACE H. WHITE, junior Senator from Maine, by Mr. John Nicolson, concerning Shipping Board matters. I have spoken to the Senator from Maine about the matter, and he has given his consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., March 25, 1933.

Hon. WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WHITE: On June 20, 1932, you said in the Senate of the United States:

"* * * this table was prepared not by the Senator from Tennessee but by a discharged employee from the Shipping Board, and I say to the Senate that there is hardly a truthful or accurate statement in the three pages making up this report."

The "table" to which you referred is a tabulation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 27, 1932, having this caption: "Statement of loans by the United States Shipping Board at interest rates lower than 3½ percent. Compiled May 1932 from official statements of the Board by John Nicolson." I, as the compiler, am therefore the person to whom you referred. Though made last June, your comment was unknown to me until late in January 1933. I read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD currently, but your speech was not in the then current number; it appeared later in the Appendix, and, as stated, I did not know it until recently.

Concerning the tabulation, you said: "There is hardly a truthful or accurate statement in it." This tabulation presents eight columns of data. Let us dismiss from further consideration the eighth column, for it presents mere simple interest computations, based on factors presented in the preceding columns; these computations, of course, anyone can make; it is substantially correct.

Now, as to the seven columns thus really involved in your comment, these contain basic data. The first three of these are data originating in the Shipping Board. All the others, viz, columns 4, 5, 6, and 7, relate to Federal securities involved in fixing interest rates on construction loans. These data originate in the Treasury Department. You say of it: "* * * there is hardly a truthful or accurate statement in them."

Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, was requested to have these columns checked up, and by letter dated February 4, 1933, he certifies that all the data in columns 4, 5, 6, and 7 are substantially correct. This covers not only the interest rates certified by the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time, but also descriptive statements of the status and nature of the Federal securities to which they relate—for these have an important, indeed a controlling, bearing on the correctness of the interest rates certified. Of all these the Secretary of the Treasury says:

"I have had the statement checked and find that the information contained therein is substantially correct."

The Secretary notes no exceptions whatever; not one. Will you not kindly read his letter? It is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 20, 1933, pages 625 and 626.

The data in columns 1, 2, and 3 relate to Shipping Board activities, viz the amounts, foreign-trade interest rates, and length of the loans listed. These also have been re-checked, as set forth in my letter to Senator MCKELLAR of March 18, 1933, and also published in the RECORD of March 20, pages 625 and 626. May I not refer you to it as a part of this letter? As therein revealed.

Only in respect to one loan was there error in the work of tabulation, namely, the loan to the Dollar Steamship Co., authorized by resolution of the Board on April 9, 1930, for improving the steamships President Fillmore and President Johnson (items 18 and 23), and the correction does not involve enough money to affect the accuracy of the statement in the tabulation, that the total interest losses will "exceed" $22,000,000 compared with interest costs to the United States, and will "exceed" $18,000,000 even when compared with the subsidizing minimum interest rate fixed by the 1931 amendment, a rate which, when used, itself represents a loss of nearly one half of 1 percent annually.

We now come to your comment: "This table was prepared not by the Senator from Tennessee but by a discharged employee from the Shipping Board." The implication is that the work of the compiler had been influenced by motives which impair that faith in it which might otherwise exist. An almost identic comment has emanated from time to time from the Shipping Board—usually having specially in view Senate Document No. 210, Seventy-first Congress: The Truth About the Postal Contracts. You have quoted it, however, in relation to the loans tabulation. This tabulation was made in May 1932. I left the Board in February 1930, and had never before published a criticism of loans by the Board. It would seem that an interval of over 2 years would itself repel the implication you intend. However, please note that this tabulation was made by me only because I was then under professional retainer by a committee of the United States Senate—a relationship which demanded impartial and accurate work. The letters referred to, and especially that from the Honorable Ogden Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, reveal that this professional demand was very substantially met.

The attack on Senate Document No. 210 by Hon. E. C. Plummer, then vice chairman of the Board (see S.Doc. No. 326, p. 31, and the reply thereto, on p. 17), having been ineffective, a "whispering campaign" was inaugurated by certain persons to impair faith in that document, the imputation being that its exposures were prompted by my severance from the Board; whereas precisely the reverse is the fact.

The letters of March 11 and 19, 1929, from the late Senator Wesley L. Jones (printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Mar. 20, 1933, p. 629) will reveal to you that I had read in a paper before the Association of American Port Authorities in Houston, Tex., in 1928, relating to this system of contracts. They will also reveal that Senator Jones, who had known something of the writer's work since 1922, happily entertained views very different from the implications of your comments.

The paper Senator Jones mentions was the first of three documents which finally evolved into Senate Document No. 210, Seventy-first Congress, The Truth About the Postal Contracts. A southerner myself and having official work under Admiral W. S. Benson, a commissioner from the South, my Houston paper was devoted to the discrimination Southern ports had until then suffered in the award of these contracts. (S.Doc. No. 326, 71st Cong., p. 27, letter to Senator Jones on this subject.)

The second document, the "Analysis of Certain Postal Contracts", was sent to the persons, and under the circumstances, revealed by my letter of November 22, 1929, and that of November 23, 1929, which letters are also printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 20, 1933, pages 626 and 627. I will not go into details, hoping you may read them. The "Analysis" criticizes severely many of the contracts. My first protests were made in May 1928—against the favoritism, the practical exclusion of competition, and the neglect to require adequate new vessels—these protests were to the committee of the Board or its chairman. Then the responsibility was transferred to the committee appointed by the President, and I renewed the criticisms there—as per the letters just mentioned, in November 1929. These earlier activities are mentioned, activities long antedating my severance from the Board, only to reveal how absurd the suggestion is that my campaign against these contracts was the result of my severance—when precisely the reverse is the fact.

I was well aware of the seriousness of the step taken in November 1929 in sending the Analysis and the letter of November 22 to the members of the interdepartmental committee the President had appointed; and even more so, of the letter to the Board charging the Board with responsibility. Concurrently with those letters, I told the Board, by telling Commissioner Smith, that the step had been taken "regardless of consequences" to myself, and repeated these words to him, for emphasis; this of course was tantamount to placing my resignation in their hands. I did not at once more formally resign because I wanted a hearing, with the Commissioner who had special charge of these contracts (Mr. Plummer) present, as expressly requested in my letter to the Board (letter of Nov. 23, 1929). I had twice previously resigned from the Board during my 8 years there, but in neither case was it accepted.

Pursuant to that request I appeared before the Board November 29 and presented my attitude generally; but Commissioner Plummer was not present, and the matter was postponed. Not having been resumed by January 10, 1930, I wrote the chairman my letter of that date (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 20, 1933, p. 628) asking for a final hearing, and the meeting of January 23, 1930, resulted. I entered that meeting fully expecting to resign at its close; but Mr. Plummer was again not present, and I emphasized my regret that he was not, as I wanted a colloquy with him before the Board, hoping, before leaving, to impress the members who had had little to do with these matters with the enormity of some of the contracts which had been made.

The closing paragraph and sentences of the stenographer's minutes of the meeting of January 23, 1930, are also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 20, 1933, page 628. Please read them and note that the hearing was left definitely open until at earliest February 1; then note on the same day, January 23, the chairman wrote me his letter of that date (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 20, 1933, p. 627) informing me my resignation was accepted, effective February 1—the very date to which the continuance had been taken. The real reasons for my severance are given in my reply of January 25, 1930 (same CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 627). In confirmation of its rebuttal of the chairman's "reasons" for the "resignation", there are also printed in the same RECORD two documents signed by Commissioners Benson and Plummer (I was director of their respective bureaus); one, a letter to Representative Wood, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, dated January 15, 1928 (pp. 628–629); the other, an official report, sent by the chairman of the Board to the Personnel Classification Board, recounting my status and functions at the Board (pp. 629–630).

The chairman's letter of January 23, 1930, while stating the "resignation" would be effective February 1, also stated my pay would be computed to March 11. The letters between us, dated January 31, February 1, 2, 3, and 4 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 20, 1933, pp. 627–628), will reveal his unwillingness to concede the supplemental payment could be accepted, and yet, after February 1, I be free to talk; hence my reply to the question asked me at a hearing of the Senate Committee on Appropriations whether I had received the $825, which was the amount of the supplemental payment proposed: "Mr. Chairman, the payment of the $825 seemed conditioned upon my remaining silent from February 1 to March 11, and I declined to accept it. It was never paid me" (p. 628). There were some important shipping bills then pending on which I had hoped to be heard.

Your speech related to the renomination of a Commissioner of the Shipping Board, and I regret exceedingly that you should have made any reference whatever to the undersigned, and especially a comment so unjustified as the one in fact made.

Yours very truly,

JOHN NICOLSON.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill, being House bill 5389.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in the event the bill is taken up, it is my expectation, after the Senate may have transacted a small amount of legislative business, to move an adjournment until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed and lie on the table an amendment which I shall propose to the independent offices appropriation bill. This is a legislative amendment. It is made necessary by the fact that in the analysis of section 36,

Public Act No. 10, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 12, 1933, being the Farm Relief Act, in which were incorporated provisions having reference to other subjects, it has been found by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that it is very questionable whether the provision is workable without some modification.

It may or may not be remembered—however, it is the fact—that the Committee on Banking and Currency revised the provision of the bill referred to having relation to the indebtedness of drainage and other improvement districts. The amendment has been drafted by experts, and I am offering it on the appropriation bill for the simple reason that it is highly important that the provision shall be perfected before the end of the present session of the Congress and there is anticipated difficulty in getting consideration of the subject in a separate bill.

I make this brief explanation now in order that those who have charge of the appropriation bill may understand the reason for offering a legislative provision.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Would not the amendment be subject to a point of order unless it has been approved by a standing committee?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator expects to have that done, does he?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I hope it may not be found necessary, but I recognize in my statement that the amendment is subject to a point of order. The object of my statement is to avoid, if possible, having the point of order raised.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in order to be on the safe side may I suggest that it would be better for the Senator to offer a motion to suspend the rules? Then it would be in order as a matter of procedure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I had intended to take a different course about the matter. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I do not believe any Senator will make a point of order upon the statement submitted here. The amendment does not change in principle the provision that has already been adopted by both Houses of Congress. It modifies the language so as to make the provision workable in the opinion of those who are compelled to administer it. In that view of the subject I do not anticipate anyone will arbitrarily and unnecessarily impose a point of order. If it involved the question of new legislation touching a subject of so great importance, I should anticipate the making of a point of order; but I have explained that the whole subject matter of the amendment is already covered by existing legislation. The changes appear to me to be comparatively few and simple. Counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation hold that there are some changes, which will be explained later, that are necessary in order to give prompt and effective application to the statute.

Mr. REED. The Senator is not offering the amendment at this time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; certainly not. I am simply asking to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the able Senator from Arkansas if there is objection to having the amendment referred to the appropriate committee? I did not hear the Senator's entire statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the amendment should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency. That would be the appropriate committee. However, that committee is having almost continuous sessions, and there is some doubt in my mind as to whether it would be possible to get consideratiton by the committee before the pending bill is acted upon by the Senate. That is one of the reasons I have not asked its reference to a standing committee.

Mr. COSTIGAN. So far as I know, there will be a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee on Monday or Tuesday. Might we not report back the amendment——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The committee might, but the question I am interested in is whether it would.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, this amendment merely clarifies what we have already enacted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LONG. When the officials came to administer the bill they found that our wording was such that the experts wanted to re-form it, so that there would be no question about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Frankly, if a point of order is made and sustained, I will take steps to have it voted upon in connection with other legislation that is coming on. I intend to have the Senate consider it but have not asked its reference to a standing committee because the provision was reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, and that committee may not meet again in time. The language that was heretofore adopted, as I have already explained, has been found not workable. I did not wish to estop myself from offering it to this bill by having it go to a committee that might not report before the bill was finally disposed of.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. At the time the feature of the bill to which the amendment relates was before the Senate, certain Senators were interested in an amendment which was adopted by the Senate and eliminated in conference. Frankly, my interest in having it go to the committee is to consider again the question whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas should not be further amended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the amendment will be subject to amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has the right to offer his amendment and have it printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not anticipate that the Banking and Currency Committee would have the opportunity to consider it. I ask that the amendment lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel a very deep interest in the amendment which the Senator has offered. I was going to make a suggestion to the Senator along the line of the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee; but the Senator from Arkansas did not take very kindly to that suggestion, and I do not want to interfere with any method he may propose. Probably he may have a different idea as to what it may be desirable to do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Colorado, supported by the Senator from Nebraska, I ask that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no, Mr. President!

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I ask those Senators to take their full share of the responsibility.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I shall not yield until I get through. The Senator from Arkansas has entirely misconstrued my idea. I am not asking that the amendment go to the Banking and Currency Committee. I have not made any such suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understood the Senator to express the opinion that it should go to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. No; no. I have expressed no such opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. I said that I was trying to get the attention of the Chair in order to interrupt the Senator; but my idea was, if I had obtained recognition from the Chair, to make practically the same suggestion that was made by the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Arkansas had some other idea as to how the matter was going to be handled, and I concur without knowing anything about it. It is the Senator's amendment, and I do not want to interfere in any way with any method he may want to pursue to attain the result; but I should feel very much chagrined if, when this amendment comes up, a point of order is made against it, and we should either have to let it go or have to make the necessary motion, which would keep the bill before the Senate until the next day in order to bring up a motion to suspend the rules.

I have no doubt but that when this amendment is explained we could very easily get sufficient votes to suspend the rules, but there is always danger of a point of order being made; and if we have to suspend the rules we would have at least to keep the bill before the Senate until the next day. Therefore I thought we might as well start the machinery now and be ready in case a point of order were made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I give notice of the customary motion to suspend the rules in order to make the amendment in order. I think that will meet the requirements of all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment, which will be printed and lie on the table, and, under the rule, the Senator gives notice that he will make a motion to suspend the rules.

The notice of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas was reduced to writing, as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz, at the proper place to insert the following:

"Section 36, Public Act No. 10, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 12, 1933, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 36. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000, to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts duly organized under the laws of any State, and to or for the benefit of political subdivisions of States, which prior to the date of enactment of this act have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands for agricultural purposes. Such loans shall be made for the purpose of enabling any such district or political subdivision (hereafter referred to as the "borrower") to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness incurred in connection with any such projects, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; except that (1) the term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years; (2) each such loan shall be secured by bonds, notes, or other obligations which are a lien on the real property within the project or on the assessments, taxes, or other charges imposed by the borrower pursuant to State law, or by such other collateral as may be acceptable to the Corporation; (3) the borrower shall agree not to issue during the term of the loan any other bonds so secured except with the consent of the Corporation; (4) the borrower shall agree, insofar as it lawfully may, to pay to the Corporation, until all bonds or other obligations of the borrower acquired by the Corporation are retired, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by the borrower exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project and maturities of interest and principal on its outstanding obligations; and (5) the borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce, insofar as it lawfully may, the annual taxes, assessments, and other charges imposed by it for or on account of the project by an amount proportional to the reduction in the corresponding annual requirements for principal and interest of its outstanding indebtedness by reason of the operation of this section. No loan shall be made under this section until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (A) has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing and/or underlying the outstanding bonds of the applicant, (B) has determined that the project of the applicant is economically sound, and (C) has been satisfied that an agreement has been entered into between the applicant and holders of its outstanding bonds or other obligations under which the applicant will be able to purchase or refund all or a major portion of such bonds or other obligations at a price determined by the Corporation to be reasonable after taking into consideration the average market price of such bonds over the 6-month period ending March 1, 1933, and under which a substantial reduction will be brought about in the amount of the outstanding indebtedness of the applicant.'"

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, to the bill that is now the unfinished business I present an amendment, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table; and in order that I may be on the safe side, although the Committee on Appropriations is familiar with the matter, and I do not think a point of order will be made, I present as well notice of a motion to suspend the rules when the matter may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table; and the notice will be entered.

The notice given by Mr. JOHNSON is as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office, and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz, on page 61, after line 6, to insert the following new section:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to effect a modification of the contract for the construction of the Long Beach, Calif., post office, so as to afford such relief as he deems to be proper for losses caused the contractor for restoration of damages to the building occasioned by the earthquake of March 10, 1933, and to make such structural and other changes in the building as may be necessary to minimize a recurrence of earthquake damage to the building: Provided, That the present appropriation for the Long Beach project shall be available for the purposes named, and that any additional cost incurred by reason of the above shall not exceed the present limit of cost."

STATEMENT OF SENATOR M'ADOO BEFORE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement made by the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] before the Banking and Currency Committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When the United States entered the World War in 1917 I selected Russell C. Leffingwell, of New York, to be counsel for the Liberty bond issues. He was a member of a prominent law firm in New York versed in these particular matters. I had known him as a young man, his family and mine having lived across the street from each other at Yonkers, N.Y.

Subsequently, because of Mr. Leffingwell's ability, I made him an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, a place he filled with great ability and distinction. When I left the Treasury in 1918 Mr. Leffingwell remained with my successor, CARTER GLASS, and also, I believe, with Mr. GLASS's successor, David F. Houston.

After leaving the Treasury he became a partner in the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Ten years after I resigned as Secretary of the Treasury, and 4 years before I became a United States Senator from California, Mr. Leffingwell offered me the opportunity of making three investments through his firm, J. P. Morgan & Co.:

1. February 1929, 500 shares of the stock of the Alleghany Corporation, which I paid for in cash and which I sold at a net profit of $4,900.

2. January 1929, 250 shares of common and 250 shares of preferred stock of the United Corporation, which was sold at a loss of approximately $400.

3. September 1929, 1,000 shares of Standard Brands, which was sold at a loss of $7,065.

The net loss on these three transactions was $2,565.

I have never been a "preferred client" of J. P. Morgan & Co. The participations to which I have referred came to me solely through my friendship with Mr. Leffingwell. Prior to this time I had never had a transaction with the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., nor have I had any transaction with the firm since. I have never borrowed from J. P. Morgan & Co., and, therefore, have never owed them anything.

Mr. Chairman, I do not consider it necessary for me to make this statement, but I make it solely because of the misleading articles which have appeared in the press, and which are attempting, through headlines and otherwise, to impart some sinister feature to perfectly proper business transactions conducted by the Morgans on the one hand and myself on the other, within our rights and not subject to the least criticism.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 30, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 30) submitted by Mr. PITTMAN on March 15, 1933, and it was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-third Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

PRESERVATION OF VALUABLE HISTORIC DOCUMENTS

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 73, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 73) submitted by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas on the 4th instant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "exceed", to insert "$1,500", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate such sums as may be necessary, not to exceed $1,500, for the purpose of adequately providing for the preservation of old documents on file in the Senate Library.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE AT GENEVA—ADDRESS BY NORMAN H. DAVIS

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, second only in importance to the recent disarmament message to the nations of the world is the address by Norman H. Davis, chief delegate of the United States, before the general commission of the Disarmament Conference at Geneva. The message of the President and the address of Mr. Davis mark a distinct step forward in American policy with respect to disarmament and world peace. This is highly significant and cheers the hearts of millions of men and women throughout the world who believe that the United States should assume a greater responsibility in cooperation with the other great nations in the promotion of world peace.

I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD the address of Mr. Davis and an editorial in the New York Times of May 23 commenting upon the significance of the address.

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. NORMAN H. DAVIS, CHIEF DELEGATE OF THE UNITED STATES BEFORE THE GENERAL COMMISSION OF THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE AT GENEVA

The initiative taken by the President of the United States in communicating directly with the heads of the states participating in the Economic and Disarmament Conference, was prompted by the pressing need for concerted and decisive action to solve the interrelated problems with which these two conferences must deal.

The disarmament conference has reached the moment for definite decisions. We must face the issue; we must now determine whether the nations of the world propose to go forward with progressive disarmament or revert to the pre-war system of unrestrained competition in armaments with all the continuance of the international suspicion and fear which this will involve.

At the end of the World War the peoples of all states and their leaders resolved that the suicidal armament policy of the preceding decades must be changed.

They were convinced that this policy had been one of the contributing factors which brought about the war. Hence a new policy regarding armaments was incorporated as a fundamental part of the peace settlement.

This policy, adopted to prevent a future race in armaments, was based on the principle that armaments are a matter of general concern and that the time had passed when each state should be the sole judge of its armaments.

OBLIGATION ASSUMED VOLUNTARILY BY VICTORS

To carry out this conception provision was made for the disarmament of the defeated powers and at the same time a decision was taken unprecedented in history whereby the victorious states voluntarily assumed an obligation to reduce their own armaments.

As a first step the peace treaties reduced the armaments of Germany and her allies with a view to rendering impossible any aggression on their part. In fact, the theory behind these treaties was that the military forces of the disarmed powers should be fixed on the basis of the maintenance of internal order and the necessary policing of frontiers, but no more.

The whole purpose of these provisions was to guarantee that the armies of Germany and her former allies should thenceforth stay at home.

It would neither have been just nor wise, nor was it intended, that the Central Powers should be subject for all time to a special treatment in armaments. There is and has been a corresponding duty on the part of other powers, parties to peace treaties, that by successive stages they, too, would bring their armaments down to a level strictly determined by the needs of self-defense.

While the United States is not bound by the provisions or the implications of those treaties, I have no hesitancy in saying that it is the will of our people, interpreted by President Roosevelt, to join with the other powers in disarming down to that level, and we are prepared to exert our influence to bring this about, not by theoretical statements of good intentions but by decisive and progressive reduction of armaments through international agreement.

The present situation admits of no further delay. The states of the world must either go forward in good faith to carry out in all its implications the disarmament policy which they adopted in 1919 or we must recognize frankly that this policy has been abandoned and reconcile ourselves to reverting to a race in competitive armament.

WAR INEVITABLE IF CONFERENCE FAILS

If the latter course is taken, the consequences are inevitable. Sooner or later there will be the breakdown of the peace machinery which has been so laboriously built up since 1918, and the world will be swept into another war.

The immediate result of a failure here would be a set-back to economic recovery, which depends upon such mutual confidence between nations as will permit a real collaboration in the task of restoring international trade and the freer movement of goods.

This is impossible in a situation clouded by the fear of war. National budgets which should be devoted to productive and social ends are burdened with excessive and wasteful expenditures for armament. This leads in turn to an almost unbearable load of taxation on all our peoples.

If we thus candidly face the situation, there is really no alternative for a sane world to consider. It is inconceivable that the responsible leaders of any country in the world could hesitate over this issue. We cannot shirk the duty which this choice imposes upon us. We cannot safely delay taking effective steps to reduce armaments to a purely defensive basis.

As far as the position of the United States is concerned we are frank to recognize that we have a simpler problem to meet than have many of the European powers. Fears and apprehensions based on historical and racial grounds have led to the maintenance of large armaments in Europe. These large armaments have caused resentment, particularly in the less-armed countries. The resulting political tension has in turn reacted to keep up the general level of armaments.

We are not unaware of the difficulties which lie in the way of reduction in armaments here. It is our very detachment from this situation which gives us hope that we may exert a helpful influence toward the realization of our common objective. But we are prepared to aid in other ways than through exerting our influence, and I shall take this opportunity to show what we are prepared to do.

WHAT THE UNITED STATES IS PREPARED TO DO

As regards the level of armaments we are prepared to go as far as the other States in the way of reduction. We feel that the ultimate objective should be to reduce armaments approximately to the level established by the peace treaties; that is, to bring armaments as soon as possible through successive stages down to the basis of a domestic police force.

In particular, as emphasized by President Roosevelt, we are prepared to join other nations in abolishing weapons of an aggressive character which not only are the more costly to construct and maintain but at present are those most likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

To cut the power of offense and remove the threat of surprise attack would do more than anything else to lessen the danger of a war.

Almost a year ago the American Government submitted a proposal along these lines. This proposal, which received the approval of a large number of states, was not acceptable to certain states, and was therefore not adopted.

A few weeks ago the British Prime Minister submitted a detailed proposal which embodies many of the features of the American plan of last year. As the British proposal represents a real measure of disarmament, we accept it whole-heartedly as a definite and excellent step toward the ultimate objective. We therefore are prepared to give our full support to the adoption of this plan.

In addition, I wish to make it clear that we are ready not only to do our part toward the substantive reduction of armaments, but if this is effected by general international agreement we are also prepared to contribute in other ways to the organization of peace.

In particular we are willing to consult the other states in case of a threat to peace with a view to averting conflict.

Further than that, in the event that the states, in conference, determine that a state has been guilty of a breach of the peace in violation of its international obligations and take measures against the violator, then, if we concur in the judgment rendered as to the responsible and guilty party, we will refrain from any action tending to defeat such collective effort which these states may thus make to restore peace.

EFFECTIVE SUPERVISION HELD INDISPENSABLE

Finally, we believe that a system of adequate supervision should be formulated to insure the effective and faithful carrying out of any measure of disarmament.

We are prepared to assist in this formulation and to participate in this supervision.

We are heartily in sympathy with the idea that means of effective automatic and continuous supervision should be found whereby nations will be able to rest assured that as long as they respect their obligations with regard to armaments the corresponding obligations of their neighbors will be carried out in the same scrupulous manner.

The disarmament conference has already formulated measures for the establishment of a permanent disarmament commission. The powers now proposed for this commission may well be reinforced. The commission will have many important duties, but none more essential than that of effectively supervising the fulfillment of the treaty.

We recognize that the ultimate objective in disarmament must be attained by stages, but we believe that the time for the next and decisive step is long overdue and cannot be further postponed.

Virtually all the nations of the world have entered upon the solemn obligation of the Briand-Kellogg Pact to renounce war as an instrument of national policy and to settle their disputes only by pacific means.

If we are to keep faith with these obligations, we must definitely make up our minds to settle our disputes around a conference table instead of preparing to settle them on the battlefield.

It was with such a thought that the President proposed an undertaking by the nations that, subject to existing treaty rights, armed forces should not be sent across national frontiers.

SIMPLEST DEFINITION OF AN AGGRESSOR

In the long run we may come to the conclusion that the simplest and most accurate definition of an aggressor is one whose armed forces are found on alien soil in violation of treaties.

There have been two main obstacles to disarmament. One was the apprehension that Germany proposed to rearm; the other the reluctance of the armed powers of Europe in the present state of the world to take a real step in disarmament.

If at this decisive point any nation should fail to give conclusive evidence of its pacific intentions and insist upon the right to rearm, even though the other powers take effective and substantial steps toward disarmament, then the burden of responsibility for the failure of the disarmament conference, with the incalculable consequences of such a failure, would rest on the shoulders of that nation.

The problem with which we are faced cannot be solved if one nation insists on rearming while the others disarm. The result inevitably would be another race in armaments.

As regards the action of the other powers we are not unaware in the United States of the political difficulties which still lie in the way of the reduction of European armaments.

We recognize the legitimate claim which any state has to safeguard its security.

But we are firmly convinced that in the long run this security can best be achieved through a controlled disarmament by which the military strength of the most heavily armed nations is progressively reduced to a level such as that provided for in the peace treaties.

To the extent that armaments create political tension they in themselves constitute a menace to peace and may jeopardize the security of the very nations which maintain them.

If we take a long step in the direction of disarmament today and agree by stages to achieve our ultimate objective, we can meet any legitimate claim of the powers bound by the peace treaties and at the same time effectively help to insure peace.

A few days ago the conference met a serious obstacle to further progress in its detailed examination of the British plan. Since then there has been an appreciable change.

NEW GERMAN ATTITUDE MAKES FOR SUCCESS

The recent speech by the German Chancellor before the Reichstag clarifying the German attitude and policy with regard to disarmament and endorsing the proposal of President Roosevelt has been most helpful.

This and also the subsequent announcement made here by our colleague, Herr Nadolny, of Germany's acceptance of the British plan as the basis of the future convention, have so altered the situation as to justify us in assuming that we can now resume our consideration of this plan with real hope of agreement.

Our present agenda is a consideration of the chapters on war material. It was understood that other related subjects might be introduced and my colleagues may feel that I have made wide use of the latitude thus given me.

But in closing my remarks and to bring our discussion back to the concrete question before us I desire to state that the American delegation accepts the chapter on material and expresses the hope that the other delegations will join in this acceptance and that the way may thus be cleared for an immediate decision on the concrete proposals in this chapter.

This conference is not only a disarmament conference. It is an emergency conference of a world in a state of political uncertainty and economic depression.

The next weeks will bring the decisive test. It will require courage and statesmanship to meet this test, but the failure to do so will go far to shatter any hope of world organization for peace.

As far as the United States is concerned, our abilities and our incentive to collaborate wholeheartedly in the continuing task of helping to maintain world peace depend in large measure upon the results achieved here in disarmament.

UNITED STATES READY TO SHARE RESPONSIBILITY

President Roosevelt's message is a clear indication of the fact that the United States will exert its full power and influence and accept its just share of responsibility to make results in disarmament definite, prompt, and effective.

The results of success here and now would bring benefits beyond all calculation. It would give new confidence and hope—confidence that governments can still govern and leaders lead; hope that a definite step in disarmament having at last been taken, economic recovery will be hastened and the millions in all countries who are only asking for the opportunity to work will have restored to them the possibility of living in peace and of earning their daily bread.

If by a great act of faith each and every nation will now summon the courage to take a decisive step in general disarmament, conditions throughout the world will so improve that we can henceforth face the future with a real feeling of security and confidence.

With the alternative to success in mind, we cannot allow ourselves to fail.

A STEP FORWARD

Yesterday's address by Mr. Norman Davis at Geneva naturally followed the lines of President Roosevelt's message to the world last week. The main points are the same, though they were emphasized and perhaps more clearly defined in detail by Mr. Davis. The net effect of his announcement of American policy is agreement with the thesis that, in the next war, if there is to be one on a great scale, there can be no such thing as neutrality. The United States will be prepared to waive all rights as a neutral, provided that, after consultation with other nations, she has herself decided that an aggressor is threatening the peace of the whole world. It is clear that, as President Roosevelt stated the other day, this vital decision will not be forced upon our Government by other nations but "made right here in Washington." Thus national self-determination would be retained. But there is no mistaking the fact that, as the other delegates at Geneva at once perceived, and as the foreign diplomats in Washington immediately concluded, the Davis speech proclaims an advance in American policy as respects disarmament and all the possible issues of war or peace.

Highly significant was the statement by Mr. Davis that the United States would not favor an agreement by which any nation would be allowed to rearm. This, of course, looks straight at the German contention. On the other hand, Mr. Davis conceded that a fair interpretation of the Versailles Treaty would obligate the victors gradually to cut their armaments down to a defensive level no higher than that imposed upon the vanquished. But almost in the same breath Ambassador Davis gave it as the American view that "the territorial status quo" should be maintained. This reads amazingly like a tacit adherence to the famous article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which was fought to the death by the United States Senate in 1919, and had much to do with its final rejection of the Versailles Treaty.

The inevitable inference is that the world has moved, and that the United States has moved with it. This country no longer boasts of its "splendid isolation." The President and his special representative at Geneva have now fully recognized the fact that our chief interests are inextricably bound up with those of the rest of the world. To this extent there has been a frank change in the American attitude. Thus far its manifestation and effect are largely mental. But the time for practical application may come sooner than many think. As the case stands today, our Government has plainly shown that it sees not only an obligation but an advantage in joining other nations in the pursuit and realization of the necessary means of keeping the peace.

REGULATION OF PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Nation of May 31, 1933, entitled "The Supreme Court Blocks Utility Regulation."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Nation, May 31, 1933]

THE SUPREME COURT BLOCKS UTILITY REGULATION

By Will Maslow and E Michael White

While public-utility consumers all over the country rightly complain about excessive utility rates and seek improvement in the personnel of their public-service commissions, the real villains in the piece—nine black-robed old gentlemen in Washington (or a majority thereof)—escape attention and criticism. In the shadow of the Capitol, far removed from the whir of turbines, the roar of waterfalls, or the ring of the utility bill collector, the United States Supreme Court, "the watchdog of the Constitution", manufactures decisions which thwart the public desire and interest, cause the more enlightened regulatory commissions to throw up their hands in disgust, and permit the utilities to enjoy the benefits of anarchic monopoly. The latest decision of the Supreme Court on public-utility regulation, handed down May 8, 1933, in the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. case, and hailed as a great step forward, is only another reminder that the chief obstacle to effective regulation is the attitude of the Supreme Court on the all-important and little-understood quesion of "valuation."

In November 1930 the California Railroad Commission ordered a cut in the gas rates of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. which was calculated to reduce the company's revenues by about 9 percent. The company appealed to the Federal courts, invoking the magic word "confiscation." Two and one-half years later the Supreme Court reviewed the case. The Court upheld the new rate, since it allowed a return of 7.7 percent on the commission's valuation based on the theory of "historical cost" and a return of 7 percent on the valuation based on the "reproduction-cost theory." (These theories and their importance will be discussed farther on.) The rate order of the California commission which the Supreme Court upheld was hardly a revolutionary or daring one. For example, it failed to deduct anything for depreciation (a minimum of $7,650,000), which it might have done under the law. The Supreme Court used this difference to account for the mythical "going value."

Although the Supreme Court achieved a proper result in upholding this order, which it could hardly have reversed, the opinion itself, written by Chief Justice Hughes, only served further to muddle the already muddled utility law by perpetuating the confusion and uncertainty which now exist. The "liberal minority" of the Supreme Court, headed by Mr. Justice Brandeis, failed to dissent from this unsatisfactory decision. The dissent, however, was forthcoming from Justices Butler and Sutherland, who asserted that the company's property was being confiscated. Mr. Justice Butler could have concurred safely in the majority opinion in this case. But the learned Justice, in his early days a utility lawyer, found it necessary to dissent very vigorously from the majority opinion. He said: "As the commission's refusal to apply principles of valuation established by our decisions resulted in arbitrary undervaluations, the prescribed rates should on that ground be set aside."

The financial history of a utility company claiming confiscation is worthy of comment. In 1924 the Los Angeles company paid a dividend of 33.75 percent, which included a stock dividend of 25 percent. In 1925 the dividend on the capitalization thus inflated was 9 percent; in 1926, 9.8 percent. In 1927 another stock dividend was declared, this time of 21.42 percent, making a total dividend for the year of 35.17 percent. In 1928 on this last increased capitalization, the company paid a dividend of 16 percent; in 1929, 17 percent; and in 1930, the year before the "confiscation", 21 percent. In 1931, after the alleged confiscation (also in the second year of the depression), the company paid a dividend of 16.75 percent on its common stock. Meanwhile, the company's surplus increased from $381,212 in 1916 to $4,176,663 in 1929, while its depreciation reserve increased from $3,804,383 to $16,804,105 in the same period.

All the common stock of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. is held by the Pacific Lighting Corporation, a holding company. This happy parent of so productive a child paid a 16-percent dividend on its common stock in 1926 and 1927. In 1929 it split its common stock 10 for 1, and since that time has paid $3 a share on each of the new shares, or 30 percent on the original par value of $100. (It should be recalled that electric utilities, according to their own propaganda, make no profit.) How could a corporation with such a dividend record even get into the Supreme Court with a plea of confiscation? The answer is that "confiscation" means "legal confiscation", and under its interpretation of the "due process" clause of the fourteenth amendment the Supreme Court may find that even profitable utilities are being "deprived" of their constitutional rights. Rates are fixed in the first instance by regulatory commissions established by State legislatures. The Federal courts may, however, forbid such rates, on the theory that the utility has a constitutional right to a fair return on the fair value of its property, commonly referred to as the rate base. If the Federal court believes that the rates fixed by the State commission are so low that the utility will be unable to earn what the court regards as a fair return on that rate base, it declares the rates confiscatory and enjoins their enforcement.

There are two conflicting theories as to the correct method for determining fair value: One is the theory of original cost; the other is the theory of reproduction cost. According to the first method, advocated by Mr. Justice Brandeis and spokesmen for the consumer, the fair value, or rate base, is fixed as that sum originally invested in the business. Advocates of this theory contend that if an investor receives adequate dividends on his actual investment (taking into consideration the nature of the public-utility industry) he ought to be satisfied. According to the second method, the fair value of a utility is fixed as the present cost of reproducing it. This theory as applied in a period of rising prices has meant millions of dollars added to the rate base and therefore to rates.

The cost-of-reproduction theory has few defenders besides utility lawyers and certain members of the Supreme Court. Its vices are many: It is based on illogical premises, it calls for frequent and expensive appraisals of utility property, and it loads the rate base with mythical items of value. What is the present value of a complicated and extensive utility business? Spokesmen for the utilities have urged that the present cost of reproducing its property be taken as the sole measure of its value. They might have argued with some justification that the cost of constructing a plant which would produce the present service should be taken as a measure of value. But the reproduction-cost theory involves a reproduction of the plant and not of the service. For example, if plants of the New York Edison Co. were to be torn down, its obsolete machinery producing direct current would surely not be replaced. But the New York Edison Co. insists that in measuring the value of its property the present cost of reproducing its entire plant, with its inefficient locations, its small generating units, its dangerous overhead wires, its direct-current switchboards, must be determined and included in the rate base.

The cost-of-reproduction theory is not only illogical but demands a technique of pure guesswork. How delusive the supposed exactness of this technique is can be seen from the conflicting estimates of the value of the property of the Los Angeles company. The commission determined the "fair value" of the company's property to be $65,500,000. The utility company's engineers testified to a figure of $95,000,000, an excess of 50 percent!

But if the imagination of high-priced appraisal experts is given free rein in evaluating physical properties, their fancies are absolutely unfettered in evaluating so-called "intangible factors." The Consolidated Gas Co., for example, insisted some years ago that in estimating the cost of reproducing its gas mains extra items of cost would have to be added, since the improvement in highway construction made street openings more expensive! Another utility company insisted that in the process of calculating the value of its property, if it were to be reproduced de novo, the cost of training its engineers and of making its consumers gas-conscious should be included in the rate base!

Another figment of the imagination for which the public pays is the item of "going value." What this item is, it is not for us to attempt to explain. Far be it from lawyers to rush in where judges fear to tread. According to Chief Justice Hughes, who wrote the opinion in the Los Angeles case, going value is "an element of value in an assembled and established plant doing business and earning money over one not thus advanced." This sounds suspiciously like "goodwill." Yet the Court specifically stated that "going value" was not to be confused with "goodwill", and goodwill, as an item of value, was excluded by the Supreme Court a generation ago. The result is that today only a Supreme Court Justice can distinguish between the goodwill that was barred and the going value that is admitted.

In the Los Angeles case the Supreme Court found that the value of the property as valued by the commission on an original-cost basis was $5,600,000 less than when calculated on a reproduction-cost basis. Since price levels at the time of construction were higher than those prevailing in 1930, as the Court itself pointed out, there was no reason why the reproduction cost should have exceeded the original cost by $5,600,000. Instead of pointing out this error of the commission, the Supreme Court called the excess "going value", thus swelling the rate base by about 8 percent. When the reproduction-cost theory in a period of low prices favors the consumer for the first time in 20 years, a reactionary court may nullify the effect of falling prices by swelling the rate base with the mythical item of going value.

Another vice in the reproduction-cost theory is the necessity for periodic reappraisals—at the consumers' expense. Since reproduction costs depend upon the current cost of labor and materials, every major shift in price levels demands a new valuation. In the Los Angeles case the California commission fixed the "fair value" of the utility's property at $65,000,000 on the basis of 1930 prices. After 2½ years of litigation this valuation was upheld by the Supreme Court by a 6-to-2 vote. Meanwhile, an unprecedented drop in prices has rendered the valuation hopelessly out of date. If the California Railroad Commission were vigilant—and equipped to do the work of reappraising—it would have to start another rate case, which would be passed upon by the Supreme Court in 1936.

Vicious as the theory of reproduction cost is, it is at least better than no theory at all, which is precisely the state of the law today as a result of the Los Angeles case. During the many years of high price levels a rule seemed to crystallize from the Supreme Court's learned, if not lucid, opinions that in determining the value of utility properties "dominant emphasis" had to be given to reproduction cost. While prices were rising this theory worked well for the companies, resulting in larger rate bases, higher rates, and soaring dividends. Now that prices are dropping and the consumer is about to gain from an application of the reproduction-cost theory, we find the Supreme Court edging away from it in the Los Angeles case. Chief Justice Hughes tacitly repudiated the "dominant emphasis" theory and stated that neither reproduction cost nor historical cost was to be used exclusively in computing value. He wrote: "The weight to be given to historical cost and to cost of reproduction new is to be determined in the light of the facts of the particular case."

This "light" throws a feeble glimmer in the tangled forests of public utility law. "Facts" are of no help in determining how much weight must be given to each factor. What is necessary is rules, based not on arbitrary intuitions but on logic. In this situation such rules are impossible to formulate. If the Supreme Court had directed that fair value be fixed at some point between historical and reproduction cost, the lack of meaning of such an arbitrary direction would have been apparent. So the Court hedged, as it has hedged ever since the first public-utility valuation case came before it in 1898. It refused to formulate a workable method of choosing between original cost and reproduction cost. The result is that public-utility commissioners, in addition to being lawyers, economists, and engineers, must also be psychics. They must guess which way the Court will jump next, because it is impossible to know which theory to follow, or how much weight to give each factor of value.

Had the California commission not feared an arbitrary reversal, it might have reduced the rate base to as low a figure as $45,000,000 by subtracting from its valuation figure the entire amount of the depreciation reserve. This would have resulted in an additional annual saving to consumers of at least $1,500,000 and reduced the company's revenues by 18 percent instead of 9 percent. Despite this additional reduction, the company would still have been able to pay a 9-percent dividend on its common stock in 1931, the second year of the depression.

The solution of the problem is to deprive the Federal courts of power to interfere with the rulings of public-utility commissioners. This would require legislation. If such legislation be declared unconstitutional, as it may well be, a constitutional amendment would then be necessary in order to make this change. In the many years that would have to elapse before such an amendment became law State ownership ought to be sought. Under State ownership the troublesome question of valuation for rate-making purposes would never arise. The present system of regulation is defended today only by the public utilities.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting article written by Charles S. Barrett on the subject of "The Roosevelt Farm Bill." It relates to the subject of farm legislation recently enacted.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROOSEVELT FARM BILL

By Charles S. Barrett

I have been asked at least a thousand times what I thought of the Roosevelt farm bill. The bill is a good one. The truth about this matter is the Congress of the United States never passed a farm bill that was not good. The trouble has never been in the law itself, it has always been in the administration of the law. A good law can be made to operate and have the effect of a bad law, and a bad law can be made to operate and have the effect of a good law.

FOUNDATIONS RIGHT

Take the late Federal Marketing Act with its Federal Farm Board. It was a good law. No better law was ever passed. Administration was the only trouble with that law. Practically everything that was ever started in good faith for the American farmer was good. Every one of the farm organizations that this country has ever known was founded on principles that were all right. The Grange, the American Society of Equity, the Farmers Alliance, the Agricultural Wheel, the Farmers Mutual Benefit Association, the Farm Bureau, the Farmers Union, the Gleaners, etc., all were founded on wise principles. The only trouble that any of them ever had was in their administration.

LAWS, ADMINISTRATORS, FARMERS

Those who administer government or organizations or laws will never get very far until they thoroughly understand that there is more in the administration than there is in the law itself.

Millions and millions of times it has been said that the farmer wouldn't do. They say he is too independent; they say he is too stubborn; they say he is too individualistic and noncooperative; they say he is too stupid. I will admit that there is some truth in what they say about him. This is largely due to the manner in which he has been treated in the administration of the various acts which have been passed supposedly for his benefit.

FATE OF STRONG-ARM TACTICS

Now, the Farm Board Act was administered as though its administrators had been chosen by God Almighty to save the American farmer against his own stupidity. Likewise, its manner of administration psychologized the American farmer into believing that someone was jamming something down his throat. Thus before this great act had been long in existence, an undercover opposition of the farmers to the Farm Board, and the Farm Board to the farmers, was in evidence.

The administrators of that act carried the thought which they actually often expressed, "Whip the farm leaders into line." No one questioned then, or now, the actual desire of the administrators to save American agriculture as a family unit industry. Their approach to a method of administration of this great act was where all the trouble existed.

OPPORTUNITY THREATENED BY STUPIDITY

Now the farmers of this country are not going to be "whipped into line." They are in line now. And if some missteppers don't get the farmers out of step, the present Roosevelt farm bill has the opportunity to preserve American agriculture as we know it should be. By the proper administration of this act, not only will the farmers be served but the rural towns may be preserved, business be stimulated, bankruptcy stopped, and the Nation placed back on the road to or in full recovery.

The farmer has dealt with nature and nature's God and thus has become a generous, charitable, and patient individual, in most cases without the opportunities of great scholastic attainment, rarely placed in the position of authority in public affairs or in the securing of common justice for society. If those who administer in the name of agriculture are not more stupid than they charge the farmer with being, then we will begin to get somewhere.

IGNORANT INTELLIGENCE

I honestly believe that ignorance among the powers that be is the greatest of all crimes. They have gone through the colleges of our country, and therefore are supposed to be educated. Their opportunities in life have carried them into the far places and high places. They are cultured to the point of great intelligence, but when it comes to some simple but important thing often show amazing ignorance. Their ignorance of this real farm problem is the crime of the age when they accept places of power and responsibility. Will they continue to attempt to manhandle the farmers of this Nation and know more about everything connected with agriculture than those who deal with it, who are of it, and who have graduated from its schools of common sense and experience?

KNOWING HOW, ESSENTIAL

I am telling you that this patient creature, the farmer, will not always be patient. We already hear the rumblings in the Middle West.

In the Roosevelt farm bill there is plenty of authority and plenty of money. If it does not properly succeed, it will not be on account of the farmer.

I declare to you that you can get the farmer to do anything that is right if you know how, but you have just got to know how. You have got to know how his mind works. You have got to know what is in his mind, what it is susceptible to, what is repellent to it, what he and his family suffer individually and collectively, what they enjoy. In fact, you have got to eat and sleep with the farmer to know anything about the farm problem whatsoever.

AMAZING POSSIBILITIES IN THE FARM LAW

You have got to know his likes and dislikes. You have got to know his friends and enemies; his heroes and martyrs. You have got to know whom he will follow and whom he will not follow. You have got to know every monkey-wrench thrower and every constructive fixer. You have got to know how to slip rubber pads between the monkey wrench and where it hits. You have got to know the American farmer to know anything about the farm problem.

This new farm law is a great law with amazing possibilities. There is not the least doubt about the sincere desire for making it a success on the part of those responsible for its operation. There is no room for doubt about their scholastic training and their great intelligence. Only time will tell whether we are to be victims again of the ignorance of intelligent people.

P.S.—We are all for results and should all do everything we can to make them satisfactory. But patience, in time, runs out. So here is hoping patience endures until relief comes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if there be no further business, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 29, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast made the earth by Thy power, established the world by Thy wisdom, and stretched forth the heavens by Thy understanding. We therefore humble ourselves at Thy footstool. In all our ways may we acknowledge Thee. We pray Thee that Thou wouldst sustain us in that glad confidence and in that calm assurance that all things work together for good to them that love Thee. As Thy moral law is perfect in its character and perpetual in its obligation, may we make it our way by intelligent obedience. For everything that makes life better, happier, and richer, for all the mercies that turn our days into strength and encouragement, and for the sweet memories of those blessings that abide while time shall last, we are thankful to Thee, our Heavenly Father, upon earth through the name of Christ, our redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Rules may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. Reserving the right to object, the last time I made a request to file minority views my recollection is that I asked to have the minority views printed with the majority views. Somehow the request was overlooked.

Mr. BYRNS. I will include it in my request that the majority report and minority views may be filed before 12 o'clock tonight and printed in the same document.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce to Members that the Rules Committee will have a meeting immediately after adjournment today.

Mr. McFADDEN. Can the gentleman from Tennessee tell us how much time there will be to discuss the matter?

Mr. BYRNS. I cannot tell. That will be decided by the Rules Committee.

Mr. McFADDEN. May I say that I hope there will be a liberal time given for the discussion.

Mr. BYRNS. I am sure that the Rules Committee and the chairman are in favor of a liberal time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee when he expects the legislation reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency will be brought up?

Mr. BYRNS. The object in meeting today was that the committee might report, so that the business might be brought up on Monday, if, after the suspension of the rules, there is time. The Speaker has several suspensions in mind. I am unable to say whether they will be disposed of in time to take this up or not. But there will be no disposition to hold the House for a late session on Monday.

Mr. MAPES. I realize that this is largely a formal matter—that if one objected to the request of the gentleman, the only result would be to keep the House in session waiting for the report, and so nothing would be gained by an objection. But I should like to express my own feelings about the matter. I think it is a violent procedure, to bring up a bill of such importance that was only introduced yesterday, which has been considered by the Banking and Currency Committee only 1 day, and I think with very limited hearings, if any. The Members of the House and the country have had no time to study and digest it. I think it is a violent procedure to bring it up in such a precipitous way for consideration by the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me say that it is a very short bill and only one question involved. I do not know whether there have been extensive hearings or not. We are all anxious to get through with the session as soon as we can.

Mr. MAPES. I realize that it is a short bill as far as language is concerned, but that does not minimize its importance.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not minimizing the importance of the bill.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. Just to correct the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that this bill has been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. It may have been considered by part of that committee. I do not know as to that. As usual, I went to the Departments to keep appointments which I had made yesterday. At 10 o'clock this morning I got notice of the meeting. As soon as I could get here I did so, but found when I did get here that the committee had reported out a bill taking the country off the gold standard and repudiating most solemn contracts made by the Government. Of course, some of you may think that it is not an event of any great consequence, but nobody had a chance to go into it, and I now hold in my hand for the first time a copy of the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, I do not think it does just what the gentleman says, but that is a matter for discussion.

Mr. BEEDY. It is absolutely as I state.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that these gentlemen will have this afternoon and all day tomorrow to study that short bill?

Mr. BEEDY. But the gentleman must realize that some of us go to church on Sunday.

Mr. SABATH. Well, in the morning; and with the intelligence that the gentleman possesses, it should not take him long to digest the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. In order to ask the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency whether or not any hearings were held on the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. There were no hearings.

Mr. McFADDEN. So no study has been given to the bill other than just to draft it.

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, I might say to the gentleman that he does not mean to say there has been no study of everything involved in this legislation. The gentleman fully understands that the Banking and Currency Committee for many years has studied the various phases of this legislation, and in every direction.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no objection to my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FARM CREDITS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may have until 12 o'clock Monday to file a report upon the farm credits bill, which has been pending before the committee for several days. Of course, it is not intended to take that up on Monday, but we would like to have the bill printed so Members can see it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GOVERNORSHIP OF HAWAII

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have until 12 o'clock tonight to file minority views upon the bill relating to the appointment of a Governor of Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CENTURY OF PROGRESS EXPOSITION, CHICAGO

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall be obliged to object because the session today was with the expectation that nothing would be done except to get the permission which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has already obtained. I do not think we want to stay here for any prolonged discussion. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withhold the objection.

Mr. SABATH. All I desire to say is this, that the great city of Chicago——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SABATH. All I wish to speak on is the opening of the Century of Progress Exposition in Chicago today. Surely the gentleman will not object to that.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We all know about the opening of that fair; and if I permitted the gentleman to go ahead, I would be obliged to let others.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman withhold it for just a moment? He states that the country knows all about this fair. I do not question the gentleman's statement. The country should know about it, but I do not know whether the Members do, and I want to extend an invitation to the Members to attend the exposition.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have objected.

Mr. SABATH. All I desire to do is to extend the invitation to the Members of this House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

CAN THE AMERICAN FARMER COME BACK?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by publishing therein an address delivered over the radio on Can the American Farmer Come Back, by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by Hon. WALTER M. PIERCE, of Oregon:

Can the American farmer come back? This is the question asked whenever farmers meet or the subject is discussed. It is now generally admitted that the millions of Americans who do not live on farms cannot prosper until the farmer is again prosperous. On the other hand, the farmer cannot prosper until the industrial millions have purchasing power. During the last half century I have been closely connected with the farmers of the West, raising wheat, cattle, sheep, and hogs on a large scale. In legislative halls as State senator, as Governor of the State of Oregon, and now after a brief experience in the House of Representatives I have come into contact with those who are trying to bring relief to farmers, and I am today speaking to my fellow farmers to give you my views as to the future.

Six years ago this summer I read a remarkable article by Professor Dodd, of Chicago University, entitled "Must the American Farmer Sink to Peasantry?" I remember with what a shock I read the title and followed the careful reasoning of the historian; and when I discussed it in public, I felt that my audiences were amused rather than deeply concerned with Professor Dodd's prophecy, for that distinguished author proved that the economic trend would surely carry the American farmer to peasantry. Now, 6 years later, here in Washington, I find this word "peasant" on the lips of many in high official positions. They assume it is the inevitable future condition of the American farmer. I wonder if they think the American farmer when reduced to peasantry will sustain the present Government officials in their high offices and continue to build marble halls for public buildings! I repeat, today, what I have frequently said, that, if the farmer sinks to peasantry, he will carry with him the whole fabric of our present-day civilization, officialdom, universities, and popular education. These have been supported from the earnings of the farmer. Our civilization could not have been built on a class system.

In discussing irrigation farming recently with a high official, the question of taxes and maintenance per acre on irrigated tracts was brought up, and this official seemed surprised to learn that the maintenance charges and taxes of about $5 an acre left no margin for the farmer, but represented a loss. Officialdom and city dwellers ask why the farmers remain on their farms, struggling through year after year of failure, unable to pay taxes, interest, and cost of production; going behind all the time. They do not seem to comprehend the fact that there is nothing else that the farmer can do. It would be folly for him to swell the crowds of unemployed in the cities. At any rate, the farmer has a roof and most of his food.

One of the principal causes of economic breakdown of American rural life is interest—high, immeasurably high interest—far beyond the ability of the producer to pay. Interest has always been cheaper in the East than in the West, where farmers have paid from 8 to 9 percent on well-secured loans. On Federal funds western farmers have paid from 5 to 9½ percent. By cheap interest I mean not 4½ or 5 percent, as now provided by the new farm law, but the cheapest interest at which Federal money is given to any industry. Remember that 4 percent now is equivalent to 16 percent at peak prices.

A second cause has been the excessive cost of transferring the product from the hands that produce to the mouths that consume. It is true that less than one third of the money paid by the consumer reaches the original producer. The transportation agencies, protected in their profits by Federal legislation, exact more than the producer gets. Think of the injustice of transportation lines collecting more freight rates now than in the prosperous days before the war! These excessive freight rates have made it impossible to conduct farming advantageously except in the few favored localities adjacent to the seaboard or large centers of population.

Another serious difficulty has been the contribution demanded by other utilities, those that give us light, power, water, and telephones. By special governmental privilege the owners of these necessities of life have been enabled to collect excessive profits, which have not only raised rates to those who had these conveniences but have increased costs of things bought by farmers from merchants and manufacturers who charged these rates in their overhead.

The clearest statement I have found of this situation is made by Charles Beard in his history, The Rise of American Civilization, wherein he states: "In every age and in every clime where civilization has passed its most primitive form there has always appeared a small group of men devoted to finance, commerce, and industry, who have borne down with terrific oppression upon that group that derive their sustenance from agriculture." This has been true of bankers and implement manufacturers, as well as of railways. Debts have reached such a point today that they can never be paid. Mortgages and bonds are renewed or repudiated.

The long period of depression has pressed down upon the brow of the farmer a grievous crown of thorns in the form of mortgage foreclosures. With our banking system in chaos our land values have shrunk to the vanishing point. The mortgage provision in the farm relief law is far less helpful than the one I worked for as a member of the House Committee on Agriculture, but it is a step toward justice. We must go farther. These foreclosures which are taking place throughout our land are making just as tragic an episode in American history as the selling of slaves in the public square.

Another basic difficulty has been taxation, the burden of Government being largely levied upon property instead of upon wealth measured by income and inheritance. Taxes upon property are levied without any regard to the ability to pay. To such colossal heights have taxes risen that it takes today practically the entire rental income to pay the taxes on most of the farm lands of the West. I find our national tax budget is so high that it threatens the very stability of our Government. It takes as much money to pay the annual interest on our national debt today as it took to run the entire Government when the other Roosevelt lived in the White House.

We cannot tax, borrow, nor bond ourselves into prosperity. The Grange has taken a stand against the sales tax. It is a tax on consumption, a tax on necessities, levied without any regard to ability to pay. Its general purpose is to relieve the rich and powerful and place the load on the backs of the already overburdened masses.

There are outstanding today fifty billions of tax-exempt bonds, practically one fourth of the wealth of the country, bearing no part of the burden of Government. Let us put a stop to this.

Unquestionably one of the real causes for the fall of the price of farm products is the lack of buying power among the consuming masses. I hold in my hand a chart published by the United States Department of Agriculture which shows most graphically that farm prices and the wages of industrial workers rise and fall together. Fifty billions of dollars has been the loss of buying power since the crash of October 1929—10 times the entire value of all farm products raised last year, including those consumed on the farms. We may have temporary restoration of prosperity, but its permanence depends on the adoption of measures which will increase the amount of money divided among the workers.

The farmer is politically helpless unless he is more strongly organized than any other group, because he is outnumbered and scattered. The great rich industries of the East have been created and fostered largely by privilege which has come from political power. The tariff for their benefit has practically ruined the farmers' foreign markets—one of the contributing causes of the downfall.

Whatever may be our plight today we must not lose heart; we must fight politically for economic justice and we shall struggle more hopefully because we have today in Washington an administration more sympathetic with the farmers than any that has preceded it.

I am a firm believer in the quantitative theory of money. My reading of history teaches me that among the great contributing factors that brought us out of the financial crash of 1893 was the addition to our gold supply from South Africa and Alaska, quadrupling in about 15 years the amount of gold used as money. If we cannot again repeat the experience of 30 years ago it seems to me the logical thing would be to coin silver—yes; at the ratio of 16 to 1, creating an unlimited demand for silver, thus raising commodity prices the world over. The President has been given that right and I believe he has the courage to use it. The law also gives him the right to cause to be issued three thousand millions of currency. How much better to issue currency than to create greater public debt by borrowing money through interest-bearing and nontaxable bonds. We farmers certainly agree with our President's statement in his radio speech on May 6, when he said: "Government credit and Government currency are really one and the same thing. Behind Government bonds there is only a promise to pay. Behind Government currency we have, in addition to the promise to pay, a reserve of gold and a small reserve of silver."

The causes of our troubles may be quickly summarized—interest, taxes, tax-exempt securities, fixed dividends for public utilities, high tariffs for the privileged few, lack of credit and adequate banking system, lack of buying power among the workers—all economic evils subject to correction through our political system.

Can the farmer come back? Yes; if he will use his governmental privileges. He can get cheaper and more plentiful money; he can reduce public expenditures; conditions can be made under which men will have jobs and buying power. He can insist upon a guaranteed insurance for bank deposits so that we shall never again suffer the collapse of our banking system. We can accomplish this by the ballot, our strongest weapon, and in many States by the recall and the initiative and referendum—truly popular government. We cannot handle our new economic problems by old political methods.

The political alignment is wrong. It is apparent today that both parties have conservatives and liberals. The farmers of America may help themselves by voting for their own kind. There are no better legislators than intelligent, thinking farmers.

Let me say to my farmer friends today, join the farm organizations in the communities in which you live. In my State of Oregon we have an active, virile Grange of 25,000 members. We are interested in legislation and have in a remarkable way affected the political history of the State. Great organizations can effectively bring pressure upon the public and upon legislative bodies.

The farmer cannot stand alone. Only group action will be effective. The farmer cannot come back if he is silent and lets the world forget his economic distress. He must protest wrongs, but he need not resort to violence. The farmer cannot come back unless purchasing power is generally restored. No thinking person dreams of wealth equally distributed but great fortunes and immense aggregations of capital must, through the form of taxation, feel the effect of the leveling hand, so that wealth is equitably divided and opportunity is universal.

Can the farmer come back? Yes; if he may start the return journey without the back-breaking burden of all the accumulated debts of mortgage, interest, and taxes. Farmers must come back and will come back through their own efforts, politically and economically. We must support for public office men who will help us. We must not form our opinions from the advertising press alone; we must be serious students of public questions. We must read, think, discuss, and act. Farmers and industrial workers are interdependent. We went down together, we must rise together. "Live and let live." Our other Roosevelt understood this when he said that in the long run this country is not going to be a good place for any of us to live in unless it is a reasonably good place for all of us to live in.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a joint resolution of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of Illinois relative to the St. Lawrence waterway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint resolution of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of Illinois relative to the St. Lawrence waterway.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Edward J. Hughes, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 27, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois. Done at the city of Springfield this 25th day of May A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] EDWARD J. HUGHES,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
FIFTY-EIGHTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY 1933.

Senate Joint Resolution 27

Whereas a treaty relating to the St. Lawrence waterway has been negotiated between the United States and Canada which is now before the Senate for ratification; and

Whereas this treaty internationalized Lake Michigan, a body of water entirely within the limits of the United States, and places the control in an international joint commission; and

Whereas it embodies the order of the Supreme Court reducing the flow of water from Lake Michigan into the Chicago River to 1,500 cubic feet per second, and thereby makes this order unchangeable except by international agreement; and

Whereas 1,500 cubic feet per second, as provided in the treaty, is inadequate for the needs of the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, and is therefore injurious to the entire Mississippi Valley; and

Whereas by the terms of this treaty the cost of the undertaking is borne mainly by the United States and the benefits therefrom are received mainly by Canada; and

Whereas not only are valuable rights of the whole United States surrendered by the treaty for no adequate consideration, but it constitutes a gross injustice to the State of Illinois against which Illinois should have the joint protection and support of its sister States; and

Whereas our two United States Senators, LEWIS and DIETERICH, are making a steadfast fight on behalf of the people of this State against the treaty in its present form: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the house of representatives concurring herein), That the General Assembly of the State of Illinois petition the Senate of the United States to disapprove and refuse to ratify the proposed treaty, to the end that a fair and just agreement may be negotiated between the United States and Canada; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this preamble and joint resolution be transmitted forthwith to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives of Congress from the State of Illinois.

Adopted by the senate May 16, 1933.

THOMAS F. DONOVAN,
President of the Senate.
A. E. EDEN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives May 16, 1933.

ARTHUR ROE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CHAS. P. CASEY,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, for 3 days, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, for several days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KEE, for several days, on account of important business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was absent from the House yesterday on official business. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on the passage of the public-works bill.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MORAN. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I will withhold it temporarily.

Mr. MORAN. The question, I am sure, is of interest to all Members of the House, and if not given at this time it will not be of value. I have only asked for 3 minutes. It relates to Memorial Sunday and the situation in respect to the attitude of one of the departments of Government.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. May I ask the gentleman is he asking to consider a bill?

Mr. MORAN. Nothing to do with considering a bill or any legislation.

Mr. BYRNS. Because I gave my promise there would be no business transacted today.

Mr. MORAN. It is not with regard to any business to be called up.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am going to permit the gentleman to speak 3 minutes, but at the conclusion of his remarks I shall raise the question of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN].

There was no objection.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow small groups of our citizens will repair to the various national cemeteries for the purpose of decorating the graves of the veterans. It so happens that this particular year a new problem arises through the attitude of one of our departments of Government that I think should be made known to the Members of this House. I will take, for illustration, the cemetery at the National Soldiers Home, Togus, Maine. In that particular cemetery there are 3,500 Civil War veterans buried. It has been the custom in the past to decorate those graves with the usual small flags, and leave those flags there during the summer. I can assure any of you who have never passed that particular cemetery that it is an inspiring picture to see those decorations. This year, however, a new regulation goes into effect which applies not only to that cemetery but to all other national cemeteries. It is this, that the flags which may be set tomorrow in some localities, or on Memorial Day in other localities, are to be removed the day after Memorial Day, or May 31. A short time ago it was my privilege to go to Gettysburg and witness the scene there, where one of my own ancestors fought, and I cannot help a feeling of consecration to duty as I see a thing of that sort. For some official in Washington to require the removal of those flags on May 31 is abhorrent to me; it violates the American custom of proper commemoration. I have protested to the Veterans' Bureau against this ruling, and I hope it may be changed before it is too late.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I question the presence of a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p.m.), the House adjourned until Monday, May 29, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

81. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated May 17, 1933, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers, on a preliminary examination and survey of waterway connecting Core Sound and Beaufort Harbor, N.C., authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved July 3, 1930, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1209. By Mr. GIBSON: Petition of Rutland Post, No. 31, of the American Legion, opposing removal of Burlington regional office of Veterans' Administration; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

1210. By Mr. KRAMER: Petition of Los Angeles Chapter, No. 5, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, urging Mr. KRAMER to insist in the Democratic caucus that Congress does not adjourn until President changes regulations and gives back to service-connected disabled veterans those rights, schedules, ratings, retirements, compensations, presumptions, and pensions that were enjoyed prior to the passage of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

1211. By Mr. LEHR: Petition of voters of Washtenaw County, asking that the Presidential public-works program be financed by the issue of legal-tender Government national notes instead of interest-bearing tax-exempt bond issues; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1212. By Mr. LESINSKI: Petition of Gaelic League of Detroit, Mich., protesting against cancelation, revision, modification, or the extension of time for payment of any installment of public debts due to the United States from foreign countries under existing debt agreements; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1213. By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of American Manufacturers Export Association, New York City, urging the delegation by Congress to the President of full powers to negotiate and conclude reciprocal tariff arrangements between the United States and other individual nations; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1214. Also, petition of the New York Lumber Trade Association, New York City, concerning tariff on lumber; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1215. Also, petition of National Woman's Party, New York City, urging the passage of House bill 3673; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

1216. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of National Women's Party, New York City committee, favoring the passage of House bill 3673; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE

MONDAY, MAY 29, 1933

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who holdest in Thine hand the destiny of men and nations and from whom all good things do come, look upon us with Thine infinite compassion, for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, and as we enter upon the duties of this, another day, inspire us with the sense of Thy presence and the cleansing power of Thine absolution, for apart from Thee we cannot but fail.

Sanctify our every endeavor in behalf of this Nation and our relations to the larger family of mankind, that truth and justice may be established in the earth, to the removal of the spirit of distrust and fear. Grant that as we strive for the increase of material well-being we may never be content until our souls are brought into that inner harmony with Thee, without which the spirit of man will still be athirst. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, who upon the mount in loving accents said, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar days of May 26 and 27, 1933, when, on motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Cutting	King	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Dickinson	La Follette	Russell

Caraway	Hatfield	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hayden	Overton	Walcott
Connally	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Coolidge	Johnson	Pope	Wheeler
Copeland	Kean	Reed	White
Costigan	Kendrick	Reynolds

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On behalf of the majority, I ask that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THOMPSON] be assigned to service on the following committees: Indian Affairs, Interstate Commerce, and Public Lands and Surveys.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the assignments will be made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I also, on behalf of the majority, ask that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] be assigned to service on the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the assignment will be made.

CLAIM OF THE RIO GRANDE SOUTHERN RAILROAD CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report and recommendation concerning the claim of the Rio Grande Southern Railroad Co. against the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing Congress to enact legislation prohibiting the importation of crude petroleum and crude petroleum by-products, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing Congress to adopt, as part of the emergency unemployment-relief program, a plan for the construction of worthy public projects, and to include therein the construction of the Central Valley Project of the California State water plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the relief of California Indians, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Central Labor Council of Portland, Oreg., and vicinity, favoring amendment of the Federal Reserve Act so as to enable States, counties, and cities and other subdivisions of government to obtain loans directly from Federal Reserve System banks and pay therefor the same rate of interest that may be paid by member banks of said System, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of California, praying for the passage of legislation to restore to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service of the United States their former benefits, rights, privileges, etc., enjoyed by them prior to the passage of the so-called "Economy Act", which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Justice Council, No. 2, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, Washington, D.C., favoring the passage of the so-called "Dies bill" establishing a fixed quota pertaining to the admission of alien immigrants to the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Mrs. J. N. Whitfield, of New Orleans, La., relative to the possible resumption of the investigation of the Louisiana senatorial election of 1932, and making certain references to Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MURPHY presented resolutions adopted by the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Department of Iowa, in State convention assembled, favoring reconsideration of the economy law and regulations and Executive orders issued thereunder, as to their effect on the compensation, hospitalization, and benefits of veterans, and urging that all benefits which were made for service-connected disabled veterans of the World War be reestablished as of June 30, 1930, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESS presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the people of the city of Springfield, Ohio, relative to the successful Jubilee of Progress now nearing its conclusion at Springfield, and stating that that city, along with the balance of the State of Ohio, stands at all times solidly behind the endeavors now being made to solve the problem of unemployment through a public-works program, so as to restore prosperity, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BULKLEY presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held in Cleveland on Sunday, the 14th instant, and also resolutions of the social welfare committee of the federated churches of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, protesting against the treatment of, and alleged outrages committed, against members of the Jewish faith in Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a letter from Burton E. Vaughan, secretary-treasurer, Little Rock Real Estate Board, Little Rock, Ark., in relation to pending home-loan bank legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter from E. N. Hopkins, director of public relations, Meredith Publishing Co., of Des Moines, Iowa, relative to the sale of prison-made goods in the open market, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Foreign Commerce Club of New York, N.Y., favoring the passage of legislation investing the President with authority to alter by Executive order any rates of duty within 50 percent of the rates of the Tariff Act of 1930, in the interest of international trade, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the American Manufacturers Export Association at New York City, N.Y., favoring the passage of legislation investing the President with authority to negotiate and conclude reciprocal tariff agreements with foreign nations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the directors of the New York State Automobile Association at Albany, N.Y., opposing any increased tax on gasoline, but favoring instead the imposition, if necessary, of a general sales tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions unanimously adopted by the congregation of St. John's Reformed Church, of Upper Red Hook, N.Y., endorsing the recently expressed attitude of President Roosevelt in suggesting steps toward security for all nations, and favoring the reduction of armaments, and tariff and trade restrictions, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Corporal Joseph J. Mooney Post, No. 2250, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Hornell, N.Y., favoring the compulsory military training of young men in colleges (and high schools also recommended) in the interest of the national defense, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the American Forestry Association, Washington, D.C., favoring the passage of legislation providing adequate Federal authority for the control, use, improvement, and development of the public domain, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

He also presented a paper signed by sundry citizens of Kingston, N.Y., endorsing "President Roosevelt's 30-year compulsory retirement for Federal employees as a means to relieve unemployment among the substitute postal employees in the Post Office Department, and the restoration of the 2-cent postage", which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Assembly Joint Resolution 27

Adopted in assembly April 25, 1933.

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

J. A. BEEK,
Secretary of the Senate.

This resolution was received by the Governor this 12th day of May A.D. 1933, at 3 o'clock p.m.

WM. A. SMITH,
Private Secretary of the Governor.

(Endorsed:) Filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of California May 12, 1933, at 5 o'clock p.m.

FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State.
By CHAS. J. HAGERTY,
Deputy.

CHAPTER 73

Assembly Joint Resolution 27, relative to memoralizing the Congress of the United States to adopt legislation providing for Government use of American-grown rubber

Whereas one of the greatest needs of this Nation is immediate relief of unemployment, both agricultural and industrial, and normally functioning private industry offers the most desirable employment opportunities; and

Whereas it has been fully demonstrated and proven that a large portion of the rubber consumed in the United States could and would be produced in the United States if the industry was properly assisted and protected; and

Whereas it has been proven by, first, the experimental and, second, the actual production of rubber on a commercial scale in the Salinas Valley, Calif., that rubber can be produced in the United States practically at the same cost as the plantation rubber produced in foreign countries; and

Whereas the production of rubber used in the United States would necessitate the use of thousands of acres of land now producing competitive crops that are actually not bringing the producers the cost of production but are serving to produce an overproduction of various crops, thereby lessening the profits to all concerned; and

Whereas this development would put into production thousands of acres that are not now producing anything, thereby giving agricultural employment to thousands of people; and

Whereas the milling of the rubber would require the construction of many mills, thereby giving the different industries involved in producing materials for such factory construction employment and the actual operation of said mills would give employment to large numbers of industrial workers; and

Whereas the value of producing such an article as rubber within the territorial limits of the United States, from a standpoint of war insurance and from the standpoint of actual value to the country in case of war, is perhaps of greater consideration than any other; and

Whereas the development of acreage sufficient to take care of all the needs of rubber for this country would undoubtedly require a great many years; and

Whereas there are several thousands of acres of Guayule rubber in the Salinas and Santa Maria Valleys, which is ready to be harvested and made into rubber, but which is not being harvested due to the present price of rubber; and

Whereas there are nurseries containing seedlings ready to be planted, which take 4 years' growth to produce rubber, which are also not being used; and

Whereas there is a danger of losing not only these thousands of acres of mature rubber and the seedlings ready to plant but of losing the entire development to this country, which has taken 20 or more years to develop, together with the expenditure of $4,000,000 to bring it to its present state of development; and

Whereas the immediate need is a clause in Government supply bills requiring the purchase of rubber grown in the United States, in the same manner that other American products are included: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully urges and memorializes the Congress of the United States, now in special session, to enact legislation providing that in all Government contracts requiring the consumption or use of rubber the contract shall specify the rubber to be used must be raised within the territorial limits of the United States or Territories; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California requests the honorable Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to use every honorable means to secure the adoption of such legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is respectfully requested to send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is respectfully requested to send copies of this resolution to the Governors of all the States of the United States, requesting that the legislatures of all the States pass and present similar memorials to Congress.

CHAPTER 104

Assembly Joint Resolution 29, relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation prohibiting the importation of crude petroleum and crude petroleum byproducts

Whereas the oil industry not only of this State but of other States in the United States has found it necessary to curtail production of crude petroleum and the byproducts thereof; and

Whereas the petroleum industry is one of the major industries of California and is vital to the welfare of this State and its citizens; and

Whereas one of the reasons it has been necessary to so curtail the production in this State, thereby preventing many of our citizens from obtaining a livelihood, is that crude petroleum and crude petroleum products are being imported into this country; and

Whereas the prohibition of such importation would foster the petroleum industry in this State and, by furnishing employment to thousands of our citizens, thereby substantially contribute to the termination of the present economic depression; and

Whereas the Honorable HENRY E. STUBBS has introduced in the Congress of the United States a measure numbered H.R. 4544 which will forbid the importation of crude petroleum and crude petroleum byproducts, which measure has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California most respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to enact H.R. 4544; and be it further

Resolved, That his excellency the Governor of the State of California be requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives from California in Congress.

CHAPTER 109

Senate Joint Resolution 29, relative to memorializing and petitioning the President and the Congress of the United States to adopt, as part of an emergency unemployment-relief program, a plan for the construction of worthy public projects, and to include therein the construction of the Central Valley project of the California State water plan

Whereas it is reported that the President and the Congress of the United States are now considering as part of a meritorious emergency unemployment-relief program, a large bond issue, the proceeds of which would be expended in furnishing employment to unemployed men throughout the Nation on major afforestation, reclamation, flood-control, and other worthy public projects; and

Whereas there are now in the State of California approximately 817,000 unemployed and in addition thereto a far greater number of persons dependent thereon for the common necessaries of life; and

Whereas the unemployment of this great number of people has created in our State a most serious and acute public problem and economic crisis; and

Whereas over a period of more than 10 years there has been expended by this State in excess of the sum of $1,000,000 in the investigation of the water resources of this State and in the formulation of plans for the development, utilization, conservation, and control of the said water resources; and

Whereas the development and conservation of waters of the Santa Ana River system is an important part of the State program of water conservation; and

Whereas there has been recommended and approved by the State engineer as a part of a State-wide plan, an initial project to be constructed, and known as "the Central Valley project", and construction of which will improve navigation, control floods, supply water to areas in dire need thereof, prevent the encroachment of salinity, and otherwise confer great benefits upon the people of our State and upon the Nation at large; and

Whereas the construction of said Central Valley project would in great measure relieve the present acute unemployment situation in this State; and

Whereas there has been recommended to the President of the United States and to the Governor of the State of California by the California Joint Federal-State Water Resources Commission under date of December 27, 1930, that the Federal Government participate with the State in the construction of said Central Valley project, and said Central Valley project has been investigated, reported upon, and approved by the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army; and

Whereas there has been recommended to the Governor of California by the California Water Resources Commission the construction of said Central Valley project, described in the report of said commission under date of June 1932; and

Whereas there has been recommended to this legislature by the California joint legislative water committee the construction of said Central Valley project, described in the report of said committee under date of April 20, 1932; and

Whereas this legislature did on May 5, 1933, adopt a resolution proposing to the people of the State of California the adoption of an amendment to the constitution of this State, which proposed amendment in designated assembly constitutional amendment no. 18, and relates to the control, development, and utilization of the water resources in the State, and designed to better insure and adequately empower the legislature to enact legislation in furtherance of the construction and operation of said State-wide plan and said Central Valley project; and

Whereas the assembly of this legislature did, on May 11, 1933, pass assembly bill no. 259, providing for the construction and operation of the Central Valley project of said State-wide plan in cooperation with the United States of America; and

Whereas this legislature has now taken all action in furtherance of the construction of said Central Valley project which is deemed advisable pending the reconvening thereof on July 17, 1933; and

Whereas it is now deemed advisable to seek and obtain the advice, cooperation, and assistance of the United States of America prior to the reconvening of this legislature on July 17, 1933, in order that such further legislative action may then be taken as may be deemed proper: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That the State of California through its legislature, hereby respectfully urges that the President and the Congress of the United States adopt as part of its emergency unemployment-relief program an adequate bond issue the proceeds of which shall be expended in furnishing employment to the unemployed throughout the Nation, and that as a part thereof there be adopted appropriate plans for the construction of worthy public projects, and that there be adopted as part and parcel thereof the construction of said Central Valley project and the development and conservation of the waters of the Santa Ana River system as initial projects of the California State water plan; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress.

Senate Joint Resolution 30, relative to memoralizing and petitioning the President and the Congress of the United States to adopt, as part of an emergency unemployment relief program, a plan for the completion of worthy public projects, and to include therein the construction and maintenance of roads and highways

Whereas it is reported that the President and the Congress of the United States are now considering as part of a meritorious emergency unemployment-relief program, a large bond issue, the proceeds of which would be expended in furnishing employment to unemployed men throughout the Nation on major afforestation, reclamation, flood control, and other worthy public projects; and

Whereas there are now in the State of California approximately 800,000 unemployed and in addition thereto a far greater number of persons dependent thereon for the common necessaries of life; and

Whereas the unemployment of this great number of people has created in our State a most serious and acute public problem and economic crisis: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the State of California, through its legislature, hereby respectfully urges that the President and the Congress of the United States adopt as part of its emergency unemployment-relief program an adequate bond issue, the proceeds of which shall be expended in furnishing employment to the unemployed throughout the Nation, and that as a part thereof there be adopted appropriate plans for the construction or maintenance of worthy public projects, and that there be adopted as a part of said plan the improvement of the present secondary highways in the State of California and the completion of such additional secondary highways as are now in the process of construction; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress.

CHAPTER 66

Senate Joint Resolution 22, relative to memorializing Congress to exempt from the provisions of legislation limiting hours of labor to 30 hours a week people engaged in the mining industry

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill introduced by Senator BLACK, known as "S. 158", requiring the hours of labor of all persons to be limited to 30 hours per week; and

Whereas, it is the opinion of this legislature that persons engaged in the gold-mining industry should be exempt from the provisions of such a bill by reason of the peculiar circumstances surrounding the operation of that industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the Congress of the United States be and it is hereby urgently requested and memorialized to adopt amendments to Senate bill 158 introduced by Mr. BLACK so that all persons engaged in the mining industry will be exempt from the operation of such a bill and will not be restricted in any manner as to the number of hours during which the mining industry may be carried on and conducted; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member from the State of California in Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

CHAPTER 103

Assembly Joint Resolution 28, relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for relief of California Indians

Whereas certain facts have come to the attention of this legislature indicating that the Indians of this State are living in extreme poverty, with a lack of proper housing and sanitary arrangements, and insufficient food and other necessities of life; and

Whereas the foregoing conditions have caused much sickness, distress, and suffering among the Indians on the reservations in this State; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has previously agreed, by treaties and otherwise, to properly provide for the education and housing of the Indians and the furnishing of tools, animals, and other farming equipment in exchange for lands taken from the Indians; and

Whereas it appears to this legislature that it is imperative that the Congress immediately enact legislation providing for the proper care and relief of such Indians: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully urges and memorializes the Congress of the United States to immediately adopt legislation to either provide for direct appropriation for the relief of the conditions referred to or to provide for the furnishing of proper housing and the tools and other farming equipment necessary to enable said Indians to provide their own livelihood; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of this State be, and he is hereby, requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative from California in Congress.

CHAPTER 65

Senate Joint Resolution 20, relative to approval by the President of the United States of a project for the conservation of the waters of Yosemite Creek and the preservation of Yosemite Falls in Yosemite National Park, under the provisions of act of Congress approved March 31, 1933

Whereas the Seventy-third Congress of the United States of America in its first session adopted on March 31, 1933, an act entitled, "An act for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful public works, and for other purposes", under which the President of the United States was authorized to select projects qualifying for construction in accordance with the purposes of the act; and

Whereas there is urgent need for regulation of the waters of Yosemite Creek in Yosemite National Park by means of one or more small reservoirs for the purposes of flood control, the prevention of excessive erosion, and the preservation of Yosemite Falls during the dry season of the year; and

Whereas it is highly desirable that the scenic beauty of Yosemite Falls be maintained during the summer when the great bulk of visitors are able to view this outstanding national attraction by the preservation of a sufficient supply of water to maintain a natural flow over the falls during the dry months, and at the same time accomplish desirable flood control benefits: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California jointly, at the fiftieth session of the California Legislature, commencing on the 2d day of January 1933, a majority of all members elected to each house of said legislature voting in favor thereof, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to adopt the project contemplating conservation of the waters of Yosemite Creek, and the preservation of Yosemite Falls for the enjoyment of the people throughout the entire summer season, as a unit of the program under said Emergency Unemployment Relief Act, and to cause the construction of said reservoir or reservoirs to be completed during the current calendar year.

Resolved further, That certified copies of the foregoing resolution be forwarded by the Governor of the State of California to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress.

BENEFITS OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, also I present certain petitions signed very numerously by disabled veterans in the military and naval service of this Nation during the World War, asking that their former benefits be restored to them, the benefits that were given them for wounds received in actual service, and that the economy bill may be amended accordingly. I ask that the body of one of the petitions may be printed in the RECORD, and that the petitions themselves be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Finance, and the body of one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PETITION TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE AND THE UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM THE PEOPLE OF CALIFORNIA TO RESTORE TO ALL SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABLED VETERANS THEIR FORMER BENEFITS, PRIVILEGES, SCHEDULES, RATINGS, ETC., ETC.

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States of America, residents and voters of the State of California, do hereby affix our signatures and thereby protest certain phases of the so-called "Economy Act regulations", particularly insofar as they pertain to the legitimately service-connected disabled veteran, and we do hereby further petition the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives to take such action as is necessary to revise the aforesaid regulations and/or the Economy Act itself so that there shall be restored to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service their former benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, schedules, compensation, presumptions, and pensions heretofore enjoyed by them and existence prior to the enactment of said Economy Act.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—PETITION OF UNEMPLOYED COLLEGE GRADUATES

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, early in the present month a conference was held in the city of Washington by representatives of unemployed college graduates. That conference formulated a petition addressed to the President and the Congress embodying certain considered suggestions and recommendations on the present economic crisis. In one respect the petition was particularly noteworthy. Its authors did not ask special privileges for themselves, even on the basis of their special training.

It is proper and in accordance with our recognized constitutional rights that the petition be placed in the RECORD as part of my remarks and appropriately referred, and I so request.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT AND EDUCATION

A petition presented to the President and to Senator COSTIGAN for the Congress of the United States by the National Conference of the Association of Unemployed College Alumni held at Washington, D.C., May 2–3, 1933

We, in presenting this petition, recognize the fact that our interests are indissolubly bound up with those of all other workers in society. We are not asking for special dispensation for ourselves; but rather we are asking to be put to work for society in those specialized capacities for which society has trained us. We know there is plenty of work to be done, and that there are plenty of men to do it. Since economic activities are means to an end—namely, the support and maintenance of the individual and society and the advancement of cultural activities—we believe that when one means fails of these objects, as the present means has, another must be installed to obtain these ends.

Since many of our schools are completely shut down, many more are open only part time, many teachers suffer from lack of pay, and millions of children of school age are denied a school education, while at the same time 75,000 school teachers are seeking jobs, we advocate Federal grants to counties, municipalities, and other political subdivisions for the restoration and extension of educational facilities. In addition, we recommend Federal grants to libraries and museums to continue their functions unabated.

Since statistics show that there is acute need for medical and dental care among the poorer paid workers, farmers, and the unemployed, and hospitals and clinics have been obliged to curtail services, while at the same time doctors, dentists, and nurses are destitute, we advocate Federal grants for health services, not only to remedy the immediate situation but to provide for permanent health service for all classes.

Since there is need for many public works, among others, regional development, such as city-planning projects, including slum clearance and adequate housing for all, recreational facilities, public buildings, roads, flood control, while at the same time engineers, architects, and other workers are suffering from want of jobs, we advocate a generous policy of extension of public works on the part of the Federal Government.

Since there are many persons who need legal service but are unable to pay for it, and since many lawyers are without work, we advocate the establishment of the office of public lawyer, which will, upon request, take charge of cases for either plaintiffs or defendants in civil as well as criminal cases at the public expense.

Since scientific work is essential not only as part of the Government activities but for the general welfare, and since there are large numbers of chemists, engineers, and other professionally trained men and women who are unemployed, we advocate that the Government make use of their valuable training in extending its own scientific work for the good of the people at large. For example, we recommend the extension of the testing functions of the Bureau of Standards to give information to the public on all consumers' goods, and the establishment of branches of this service throughout the several States; the enlargement of the information-gathering activities of the Department of Labor, including periodic reports on unemployment and the conditions surrounding it; the continuation and extension of the research work of the Department of Agriculture, with greater publicity for its findings; and the completion of the geodetic and geologic surveys. In addition we urge the creation of an emergency fund for Federal fellowships for these and other research projects.

We urge that in the application of the above recommendations and the distribution of employment thereunder, there shall be no discrimination on account of race, color, religion, or political affiliation.

We realize the implications of the above recommendations in that the welfare of any individual or class is dependent on the welfare of all others. This holds true not only for workers in any one nation but for workers in all nations. We therefore recommend the extension of direct Federal relief to the unemployed and to all those who lack the necessities of life; the establishment of unemployment insurance and eventually of employment assurance; the setting up of Federal employment agencies; the creation of a minimum wage and maximum hours per week law, the minimum wage to be consistent with minimum subsistence budget set by the Department of Labor; the nationalization of the banking system and the socialization of credit; the abolition of tax-exempt securities and a steeply graded increase in income and inheritance taxes with the exemption of small incomes; the lowering of tariff barriers; the recognition of Soviet Russia; and complete disarmament. In conclusion we favor a system of planned economy on the basis of production for use and not for profit.

REPORT OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 815) to provide for the survival of certain actions in favor of the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 100) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Richard Curd Pope Thomas, of Kentucky, to be district judge of the Canal Zone, to succeed James J. Lenihan, term expired.

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of William Thomas Collins, of Missouri, to be clerk of the United States Court for China.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 1796) to authorize an exchange of lands between the United States and Joseph Hodges; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 1797) authorizing the removal of rock from the submarine and destroyer base reservation at Astoria (Tongue Point), Oreg.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHIPSTEAD:

A bill (S. 1798) for the relief of L. Elbert Van Buren; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 1799) to authorize the issuance of stamped-money certificates for the relief of depositors in closed banks, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 57) calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information concerning tax assessments, income taxes, tax refunds, and claims therefor, including depletion, credits, and abatements, made by certain persons and corporations; ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. POPE and Mr. METCALF each submitted an amendment, and Mr. ASHURST submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to Senate bill 1712, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were severally referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. HAYDEN jointly submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATION OF HARRIMAN NATIONAL BANK

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, by request of the Committee on the Judiciary, I send to the desk a resolution which ought to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. May I ask, in connection with it, that Senate Resolution 55, to which the present resolution relates, may be printed in the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not hear the request of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will repeat for the benefit of the Senator from Oregon that I have sent to the desk a Senate resolution which is approved by the Committee on the Judiciary. I asked to have it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It seeks to provide further funds with which to continue the so-called "Harriman National Bank investigation." I ask that the resolution and Senate Resolution 55 may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution (S.Res. 89) was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under Senate Resolution No. 55, Seventy-third Congress, agreed to April 18, 1933, to investigate the delay in prosecuting alleged law violations by the Harriman National Bank, New York City, is hereby increased by $500.

Senate Resolution 55, submitted by Mr. COSTIGAN and agreed to on April 18, 1933, is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the reported failure on the part of the Department of Justice to prosecute promptly alleged violations of law by the Harriman National Bank, New York City, or the officers or directors thereof. The committee shall report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INCOME-TAX ASSESSMENTS, PAYMENTS, AND REFUNDS

Mr. McKELLAR submitted a resolution, S.Res. 90, which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest possible moment, the hereinafter-described information concerning the following corporations and individuals: Andrew W. Mellon, the Gulf Refining Co., the Gulf Oil Corporation, the Gulf Production Co., the Gulf Pipeline Co., the Gulf Refining Co. of Louisiana, the Gypsy Oil Co., the Gulf Pipeline Co. of Oklahoma, the Mexican Gulf Oil Co., the South American Gulf Oil Co., the Panama Gulf Oil Co., the Gulf Cooperage Co., the Gulf Commissary Co., the Standard Steel Car Co., the Middleton Car Co., the Baltimore Car & Foundry Co., the Verona Steel Casting Co., the Forged Steel Wheel Co., the Steel Car Forge Co., the Butler Bolt & Rivet Co., the Butler Car Wheel Co., the Lundora Land & Improvement Co., the Mellon National Bank, the Union Trust Co., the Union Savings Bank, Aluminum Co. of America, Aluminum Cooking Utensils Co., Aluminum Die Casting Corporation, the Aluminum Ore Co., the Aluminum Seal Co., the Electric Carbon Co., the Knoxville Power Co., the St. Lawrence River Power Co., the St. Lawrence Securities Co., the Tallahassee Power Co., McClintic-Marshall Co., Union Shipbuilding Co., Carborundum Co., the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., and the Koppers Corporation; also Ogden L. Mills, and Ogden L. Mills, executor of the estate of Ogden L. Mills, Sr.

First. The assessments for individual and corporation income taxes as first made against each of said corporations and indivuals for the years 1917 to 1933, inclusive;

PERSECUTION OF JEWS IN GERMANY—EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESSES BY BRITISH LEADERS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I request that excerpts from addresses by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain and from other addresses by British leaders on the subject of the persecution of Jews in Germany be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered printed in the RECORD as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS FOR GREAT BRITAIN AND OTHER ADDRESSES IN THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT ON THE PERSECUTION OF JEWS IN GERMANY

The Archbishop of Canterbury, House of Lords, March 30, 1933, with reference to Lord Reading's observations on the persecution of the Jews in Germany:

"I should feel I had been somewhat lacking if I did not here publicly say, representing as in some sense I may claim to do the best citizenship of the country, that I associate myself entirely with what was said by the noble and learned Marquess (the Marquess of Reading) in a way which touched our hearts a short time ago. I earnestly trust that His Majesty's Government will be able to give assurances—I know they will—that they are doing whatever seems to them possible to express the concern of the people of this country and of their Christian fellow citizens with regard to the Jewish community, and, not least, the concern of those among them who are animated by feelings of sincere friendship for the German people."

The Bishop of Llandaff, meeting at Cardiff, April 5, 1933:

"The Bishop of Llandaff, supporting, spoke of the conditions prevailing in Germany as a throw-back to barbaric ages. Civilization was, at the moment, at the crossroads, and the hope of the nations was in their ability to work in harmony, but Germany was only stirring up racial prejudice." (Western Mail, Apr. 6, 1933.)

The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Liverpool, meeting at Liverpool, April 5, 1933:

"Dr. Downey said that the eyes of the world were upon Germany, the eyes of her friends, to see if she had any constructive policy which would make for social stability at home and peace and good will with nations abroad. One could not help feeling that if she could not peacefully set her own home in order she was not likely to contribute anything of value to the comity of nations. It was deplorable that at such a time as this a narrow, grasping, racial prejudice should be allowed to stay or even put back the hands of the clock. The friends of Germany, those who wished her well, were anxiously watching her to see if they could discern any symptoms of a change of heart." (Liverpool Post, Apr. 6, 1933.)

Dr. Scott-Lidgett, President of the United Methodist Churches, message to meeting at Whitechapel Art Gallery, April 1, 1933:

"All branches of the Christian Church share with the Jewish community the horror at all civil violence, and especially at outbreaks of such violence against any particular race or class of the community. I am sure that I am speaking the mind of the Methodist Church in particular when I express the hope that steps may promptly be taken in Germany to prevent any such outbreaks for the future." (Manchester Guardian, Apr. 3, 1933.)

HOUSE OF LORDS

Viscount Cecil, House of Lords, March 30, 1933:

"As I understand it, three different allegations are made. In the first place it is said that members of the Jewish community have been treated with great violence and outrage, and that that has been done not indeed by the authorization of the Government, but without interference by the police and other representatives of the Government.

"As to that, I believe that the German Government have made in the strongest way protests against what they regard as the great exaggerations that have been made on the subject. They have said that the Government are entirely guiltless in the matter, and that such events as may have occurred have been merely the inevitable if regrettable excesses which take place in a time of revolution. If the Government have any information which enables them to confirm that view I am sure we shall hear it with the greatest pleasure. There is also another charge, that the newspapers in Germany, or some of them, have published the most violent and inflammatory articles against the Jews. Instances have been sent to me, with which I will not trouble your lordships by reading, but certainly, if they are typical of much that has been said in Germany, they are a very scandalous abuse of the license of the press. I do not understand that that is denied; at least I have seen no denial of it. Of course it becomes very difficult to understand by friends of Germany in this country—and I have never been since the war anything else—because there is in existence in Germany a very strict censorship which one would have thought would have enabled the Government to put a stop to any proceedings of that kind.

"Then there is a third matter which perhaps in its ultimate results is going to be more serious than any other to the Jewish community—that is, the compulsory dismissal of Jews from judgeships, from appointments as doctors and so on, which is going on now all over Germany. The people who are so dismissed are put in a very difficult position, because it is obvious that it will be very difficult for them in those circumstances to acquire any kind of private practice of their own, and naturally they will be ruined and put in very great difficulties as to living. That is not denied at all, as I understand it. It is admitted. Some of it, at any rate, is justified on the ground—a rather strange ground—that something in the nature of a boycott has been organized against German trade in various countries and that the governments of those countries have done nothing to stop it. That is a rather strange doctrine—novel, as far as I know, in international law—but at any rate it has this effect, that it seems to recognize that these matters are matters of international concern.

"These events have undoubtedly caused great anxiety in this country. Your lordships will not forget that there are many thousands, hundreds of thousands of Jews who are subjects of His Majesty the King, and are among the most peaceable and orderly citizens in this country. It is quite obvious that events in a foreign country which cause great anxiety and unrest in a large section of the population of this country must give anxiety to the Government, and to your lordships. I have heard at Geneva, and anybody who has been there must have heard too, the representatives of the German Government pressing very strongly for the strict administration of those treaties and, indeed, urging that they ought to be made more stringent, and that the machinery of the League should be made more drastic in dealing with them.

"Certainly it is a little astonishing that a country that has taken that line should regard it as legitimate to treat a certain section of its population in quite a different way from the manner in which it treats the majority. To put the thing quite simply, it seems difficult to contend that anti-Semitism in Germany is perfectly legitimate but anti-Germanism in Poland is an act of tyranny. That is the position which I have thought it right to bring before your lordships because it does seem to me a matter in which the Government of this country must be interested. Whether they think there is anything they can do in the matter or not is another question. In any case I am quite sure I am speaking the mind of the whole of your lordships in saying that if the Government can in this matter give us any reassurance we shall be indeed grateful to them."

The Earl of Iddesleigh, House of Lords, March 30, 1933:

"I hope I may be permitted to express my respectful and sympathetic concurrence with the remarks made by the noble and learned marquess, Lord Reading. I speak not only on my own behalf, I speak as a member of the Roman Catholic Church. My coreligionists and Lord Reading's worked together very successfully and very happily in Germany before the recent revolution, and we do feel—I think we feel in every country—real sympathy with those who are the victims of a movement which has been condemned by our bishops."

Sir Austen Chamberlain in a speech at Birmingham April 7, 1933, said:

"It is a very delicate thing to speak on what may be considered the internal politics of another country. I am very conscious that the German Government profess that they have been grossly misrepresented in the sensational and propagandist press. I am not a reader of that press. I do not draw my knowledge or inspiration from it. I read only the most sober and the most moderate correspondents, but I do not rely for what I am going to say upon that.

"I can base what I have to say on the utterances of men in authority in Germany, and I say that these utterances, at present reflecting an attitude applied only to Germans in Germany, reveal a spirit which we hoped had departed from this world, and that it shocks other nations to see the embers of a religious persecution stirring again and to hear talk of a religious or racial proscription of a great section of the German people." (Manchester Guardian, Apr. 9, 1933.)

Mr. George Lansbury and Mr. Attlee sent a joint message to the Whitechapel Art Gallery protest meeting saying:

"We sincerely hope that world public opinion will speedily prove to the German authorities that they are making a tremendous mistake in adopting their present attitude toward those people from whose ranks some of the finest men and women have sprung." (The Times, Apr. 3, 1933.)

Sir Philip Dawson and Mr. Patrick J. Hannon:

"Sir Philip Dawson, member of Parliament, and Mr. Patrick J. Hannon, member of Parliament, have sent a letter to Field Marshal von Hindenburg, President of the German Republic, in which they state that they have taken a deep interest in the promotion of friendship with Germany for the past 12 years, and add:

"'The recent action of your Government toward the Jewish community has created a profound sensation of disappointment in the minds of the friends of Germany throughout Great Britain, and we are bound to conclude that this feeling will be universal in all parts of the British Empire.

"'We earnestly appeal to Your Excellency to take such action as may commend itself to you through your Government to bring to an end as speedily as possible the attacks upon the Jewish people and restore to them their rights of German citizenship.'" (Manchester Guardian, Apr. 4, 1933.)

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The following are extracts from speeches delivered in the debate on foreign affairs in the House of Commons, April 13, 1933:

Major Attlee:

"When we come to this matter of treaty revision, I hope that our Government will tell Germany straight out that if she wants any revision she must come with clean hands. Germany is demanding a number of adjustments, adjustments on the side of Poland, adjustments here and adjustments there. There is even talk of Germany asking for a retrocession of some of her former colonies. In all the areas where Germany is demanding to get back territory there are minorities. In none of those areas is there an unmixed German population, in all there are people of alien races, and we should say quite frankly to Germany that at the present moment no one in this country would propose to entrust any minority to Germany, seeing how she has been treating minorities."

Sir Austen Chamberlain:

"I am not going to enter into a discussion of the internal happenings of Germany except insofar as they are applicable and pertinent to a debate on foreign affairs. What is this new spirit of German nationalism? The worst of the all-Prussian imperialism, with an added savagery, a racial pride, an exclusiveness which cannot allow to any fellow subject not of 'pure Nordic birth' equality of rights and citizenship within the nation to which he belongs. Are you going to discuss revision with a government like that? Are you going to discuss with such a government the Polish Corridor? The Polish Corridor is inhabited by Poles; do you dare to put another Pole under the heel of such a government? I beg the right honorable gentleman to beware of what he is doing. After all, we stand for something in this country. Our traditions count for our own people, for Europe, and for the world. Europe is menaced and Germany is afflicted by this narrow, exclusive, aggressive spirit, by which it is a crime to be in favor of peace and a crime to be a Jew. That is not a Germany to which we can afford to make concessions. That is not a Germany to which Europe can afford to give the equality of which the Prime Minister spoke. That is more than he ever promised. I understood that the promise made by the five powers was of equality of status, to be reached by stages. Before you can afford to decide, or to urge others to decide, you must see a Germany whose mind is turned to peace, who will use her equality of status to secure her own safety but not to menace the safety of others; a Germany which has learnt not only how to live herself, but how to let others live inside her and beside her."

Miss Eleanor Rathbone:

"It is not often that even a free-lance like myself finds herself in almost passionate agreement with almost every word that has fallen from two speakers so different usually in their outlook as the honorable member for Limehouse (Mr. Attlee), who began this discussion, and the right honorable member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain). But that feeling, I think, was shared by members in all quarters of the house. Since I have been a member of the house I have seldom been in a debate in which feeling seemed to be so unanimous. * * *

"Herr Hitler and his colleagues have let the world see plainly the feelings which they cherish about questions of blood and race. Their treatment of members of the most highly civilized and gifted of all oriental races, even those members of it who have been for generations peaceful German citizens, shows what their attitude would be toward weaker and less developed peoples, in places where public opinion could not exercise any control. It would be a crime to allow the present Germany any share in mandates."

Captain Cazalet:

"There will be a chorus of approval of the remarkable speech of the right honorable member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain). There can be no question in any quarter of the house as to the opinion of the people of this country on recent events in Germany, and I cannot imagine anything more effective than the appeal of the right honorable gentleman who has been for the last 15 years the best friend that Germany ever had."

Colonel Wedgwood:

"Everything I wished to say has been said far better than I could say it by the right honorable member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain), and by the right honorable member for Limehouse (Mr. Attlee), in speeches which, I believe, have been the finest of their career. They have voiced not only the true English sentiment, but they have voiced, I believe, the views of the whole of this house and of the country. The revision of the treaties is dead—killed by two speeches, or, rather, killed not so much by those two speeches as by that which caused them. * * * The corner boys of Germany have disgraced their country."

Brigadier General Spears:

"I will not detain the house more than a very few moments, because I, like the right honorable and gallant gentleman, the member of Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood) believe that the right honorable gentleman, the member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain) has expressed not only my feeling and the feelings of the majority of the house, but the feelings of the country as a whole."

Mr. Mallalieu:

"I think the unanimity with which feeling has been expressed in this house and in this country may, in some degree, bring consolation, if not active help, to those who are being oppressed in Germany now."

Mr. J. P. Morris:

"I never felt more proud of being a member of this house than when listening to the speech of my right honorable friend the member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain). It was a speech of superb statesmanship. * * *

"The whole of the people of this country are definitely opposed to the policy of the Jewish persecution in Germany, a persecution which is depriving the Jews of that country of the elementary rights of citizenship. Public opinion throughout the world sympathizes with German Jewry, and it is only owing to the existence of that world public opinion that there has been a mitigation of the persecution."

Mr. Winston Churchill:

"I am not going to use harsh words about Germany and about the conditions there. I am addressing myself to the problem in a severely practical manner. Nevertheless, one of the things which we were told after the Great War would be a security for us was parliamentary institutions in Germany; that she would be a democracy with parliamentary institutions. All that has been swept away. You have dictatorship—most grim dictatorship. You have militarism and appeals to every form of fighting spirit, from the introduction of duelling in the colleges to the Minister of Education advising the plentiful use of the cane in the elementary schools. You have these martial or pugnacious manifestations, and also this persecution of the Jews, of which so many honorable members have spoken and which appeals to everyone who feels that men and women have a right to live in the world where they are born, and have a right to pursue a livelihood which has hitherto been guaranteed them under the public laws of the land of their birth."

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir John Simon):

"I desire to say a word on a matter which the right honorable member for Epping dealt with at the end of his very impressive and moving speech, namely, the special concern which we have at the present time with regard to the news as to the treatment of Jews in Germany. This debate has been especially useful, because it has expressed the deep, general, and, I might say, universal feeling that is entertained in this country on the recent treatment of Jews and other minorities in Germany.

"I do not think it would be out of place if I say now, speaking as a member of the Government, that it would be a profound mistake for anyone in any country to imagine that this feeling is either limited to or instigated by members of the Jewish community. On the contrary, it is a spontaneous expression and it is an inevitable expresson of the attachment which we all feel to the principle of racial toleration. My right honorable friend, the member for Darwen (Sir H. Samuel), said, quite truly, that it was a Liberal principle. So it is. It is a claim which many of us who have great attachment to that general outlook may fairly make. It is one of those principles which in past times has been a subject of controversy in our own political life and in which, in the broadest sense, liberal opinion has championed the oppressed.

"It is also one of those things which have entered into the traditions of the whole of the British people. Today there is no distinction between any of us, whatever our party affiliations may be, and we cannot conceive that civil liberty, upon which the progress not only of great nations but of neighborly relations so often depend, are not gravely menaced by the matters to which attention has been called today. It is not a Jewish outlook and it is not merely the outlook of a section or of a party; it is what may truly be called the Anglo-Saxon outlook. It is the outlook of those who have inherited traditions which have been common to England and Germany alike. I make these observations knowing well the responsibility which rests upon the Government in such a matter, and I do not believe that we should be expressing the feelings of the country if I did not associate myself with what has been said on this subject today." (House of Commons, Official Report, Apr. 13, 1933, col. 2737 ff.)

OTHER EXPRESSIONS OF OPINION

Mr. Lloyd George, meeting of British and Foreign Bible Society, at Godalming, April 28, 1933:

"Mr. Lloyd George, presiding last night at a meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, at Godolming, referred to the persecution of the Jews in Germany, and said that the Bible taught the highest moral and spiritual stands of which man was capable.

"At the present moment they were enduring a mean persecution in one of the great countries of Christendom. It was rooted in a degrading envy. Jews in that country, as in every country, had attained high positions not because they were Jews but because they were men of great intellectual attainment, and many of them of resplendent genius. * * * There was a temper rising in this country to see that Germans were treated with equality at the table of the nations, and now they were reviving old memories and antagonisms and, as Sir Austen Chamberlain said the other day, the old feeling against Prussianism in its most arrogant form. It was a misfortune to Germany and the world." (The Times, Apr. 29, 1933.)

Viscount Grey, of Fallodon, Liberal Council, April 28, 1933:

"We were anxious to see Germany recover. We felt that, though defeated in the war, she was a great nation—great in science, in music, and in many of the things which are pre-eminent in civilization—and I ought to add that some of the men most distinguished in music and in science whom we honored were certainly Germans, but are also Jews. [Hear! hear!] Then suddenly there comes this attack upon the Jews, showing that Germany was not prepared to give them even tolerance. If we had done that, and so suddenly refused the right of citizenship to Jews in this country, which has been given them for 100 years, if we had suddenly gone back in that way, we should have thought that we had receded by 100 years. Well, that has happened in Germany, and with it has come a feeling apparently throughout Germany that might is right, and that all means are legitimate and may be used which are for the German race alone and to the exclusion of everyone else.

"We were, as I said, sympathetic to Germany and to the revision of the Treaty of Versailles. A few months ago a speech such as that made by Sir Austen Chamberlain in the House of Commons the other day would not have commanded the universal assent it did command. So far as I am concerned, I associate myself with what Sir Austen Chamberlain said and what the House of Commons endorsed the other day." (The Times, Apr. 29, 1933.)

Viscountess Snowden, Derby, April 10, 1933:

"* * * The Germans were depriving hundreds, if not thousands of law-abiding Jews of their livelihood, and were giving them up to starvation and poverty for no reason in the world. If that had happened in an uncivilized country, one would have said they did not know any better, but it was happening in the country that had the greatest reputation for culture in Europe. It pointed to madness." (Derby Daily Telegraph, Apr. 11, 1933.)

WORLD WAR DEBTS—EDITORIAL FROM AVON PARK (FLA.) TIMES

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD an editorial written by Judge John W. Dodge, of Jacksonville, Fla., entitled "World War Debts: They Must be Paid," appearing in the Avon Park Times of Florida. This is one of the best and most forceful expressions I have seen in opposition to the cancelation of the war debts.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Avon Park (Fla.) Times of May 19, 1933]

WORLD WAR DEBTS—THEY MUST BE PAID

By Judge John W. Dodge

Fifteen sovereign nations in Europe owed last year to Uncle Sam the stupendous figures of over $12,000,000,000, proposed to be paid over a period of 62 years, which with interest would amount to $22,000,000,000.

Great Britain, France, and Italy owed eleven twelfths of the above; and Great Britain's part was $4,715,310,000.

The United States borrowed, evidenced by her Liberty bonds and other obligations sold to Americans, the money she lent to Europe.

On July 1 the Treasury Department had received $1,677,333,024 in return for her generosity some 15 years ago. The cost to the United States, in interest paid to carry those debts from their dates of settlement to July 1, has been in excess of $4,000,000,000, which places the United States $2,365,499,538 the worse off for playing the part of Santa Claus to Europe when she began the little exhibitions of pyrotechnics.

Inasmuch as the payments made and to be made for 62 years by debtor nations will be insufficient to pay the interest charges incurred by the United States to carry these debts, it is evident there will never be anything to apply on the principal. Hence, these principal sums are canceled. To determine the consequent loss to July 1, 1932, add together the sums of $2,365,499,538 excess interest paid by the United States and $12,090,667,000 total debts. The sum is $14,466,117,000. From year to year this huge loss will increase even though the debtor nations pay their obligations in full.

With retaliatory foreign commercial agreements and tariffs imposed by those European nations against us; with defaults by France and others, with constant dickering to repudiate, or slip from under those debts, it behooves American taxpayers to write their Senators and Representatives in Congress not to let those debts be saddled on Americans.

Let Europe default; it will spell her, not our, ruin and destruction of credit for carrying on any future wars. Others will not, if she defaults and repudiates her obligations, hereafter lend her either credit, money, or gold.

There is no use in Americans playing Santa Claus to let Europe shoot fireworks of war, to destroy human beings as cannon fodder. If they are made to pay, they will, of necessity, have to live in peace, in honesty, with others.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER—ADDRESS BY JOHN A. SIMPSON

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an able and interesting address delivered by John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, over the National Broadcasting System on May 27, 1933. It will be noted that Mr. Simpson states that the Farmers' Union is cooperating with the National Bimetallic League for the remonetization of silver.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

First of all, I want to talk today to you farmers listening in who are not members of the Farmers' Union and, especially, you farmers east of the Mississippi River. On you rests the blame for the defeat of the two measures that have been pending in this and the last two sessions of Congress—one known as the "cost of production bill" and the other as the "Frazier farm mortgage refinancing bill." If you farmers in the East had been members of your class organization, the Farmers' Union, to the extent that the farmers of the West are, we would have been able to pass both of these measures in this session of Congress. It is not the bankers, it is not the lawyers or the doctors who keep you from getting what is right in an economic or legislative way. It is the unorganized farmers who are the rock in the way.

A Western State with small population like, for instance, South Dakota, has two Senators. Just as many as the State of New York or Pennsylvania. But it has only 2 Members of the House of Representatives while New York has 47 and Pennsylvania 35. About 20 Farmers' Union States west of the Mississippi River can get considerable recognition and consideration in the Senate but very little recognition and consideration in the House of Representatives.

If you farmers in the East will wake up and get into your class organization in a few years' time we will be able to get real legislation for farmers instead of very poor substitutes and imitations.

As an example, take the cost-of-production amendment to the farm relief bill that recently passed this session. In the Senate the Farmers' Union was successful in spite of the opposition of supposed farm organizations and of the administration in having the amendment voted into the bill. In this vote 19 Republicans voted for the bill and 28 Democrats voted for the bill; 14 Republicans voted against the bill and 27 Democrats voted against the bill. You will observe, if you get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that nearly all of our votes came from the Western States, where we have the Farmers' Union. You will find the vote in April 13 issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Then take the vote in the House on this amendment and you will find that most of the Members of the House from the Farmers' Union States voted for the amendment, but your Congressmen from east of the Mississippi River voted against it almost to a man. So far as States are concerned about the same number of States voted for it in the House as did in the Senate, but they were States with few Congressmen. The vote in the House on this was 109 for and 283 against.

If this amendment had remained in the bill and the Secretary of Agriculture had desired to help farmers he could have had it operating on many crops in 10 days. If you farmers in the East were Union farmers you could be receiving cost of production for that portion of your products consumed in this country, this very moment. This is not a wild statement. In 1919 this Government did that very thing for wheat farmers. I begged the committees of the House and Senate to do for all agriculture just what they did in 1919 for wheat. But because you farmers in the East were completely unorganized, so far as a class organization is concerned, your Congressmen voted against giving you that thing.

The facts are supposed farm organizations were there telling your Congressmen they were representing you and that you did not want this amendment. They told your Congressmen that they represented you and that you did not want the Frazier bill to become a law. In other words, that you did not want this Government to do for you what it has been doing for other groups—refinancing them many times at less than 1½ percent interest. The Frazier bill provided that the Government should lend farmers money to pay off their farm mortgages and that the Government should charge the farmers 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent on the principal each year until the debt was paid. Mr. Farmer in Pennsylvania, Mr. Farmer in New York State, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, you could be looking that mortgagee you owe in the face today and telling him, "Here is the money" if you had been members of the Farmers' Union. Mr. Farmer of the East, if you had been a member of your Union we could have passed the Frazier bill and thereby reduced the annual interest debt of the farmers of the United States by half a billion dollars. In 20 years the difference in interest would pay the principal.

Farmers everywhere, so far as the farm relief bill is concerned, in those parts that pertain to marketing and to refinancing of farmers it will be a complete failure.

You farmers with a distressed loan on your farm, write to the Secretary of Agriculture and find out how quickly you can be refinanced at a lower rate of interest. The facts are, most of you cannot be refinanced at all.

Remember, the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce helped to write the bill. It is the Farmers' Union, the farmers' class organization of the United States, that can tell you these truths without fear or favor. As president of the National Farmers' Union I am under obligations to no human on earth except the members of the Farmers' Union.

You farmers listening in, when you sell that load of wheat that you will be threshing pretty soon see if I am stating the truth when I tell you that you will not take home with you one penny more than the market price. All you will receive at the time of selling a load of wheat besides the market price is a promise that along about Christmas Santa Claus will send you a check. Again, mark my words, that check will be so small that many of you will send it to Secretary Wallace with a letter that will not be very complimentary. You may send a few to the President of the United States. You ought to. The President of the United States ran on a platform that pledged farmers cost of production, and then, through his spokesmen in the House of Representatives, prevented the cost-of-production amendment's going into the bill.

While we have not been able to put the Farmers' Union program through just as we would have it, yet there is more of our program in the legislation that has passed than that of any other group.

In the farm-relief measure one thing that is thoroughly established is price fixing of farm products. That is the principle involved in the Farmers' Union plan. The only difference is the basis of fixing the price. It is my judgment that another session of Congress will adopt the Farmers' Union method of fixing the price.

Likewise, the principle of the Government seeing that farmers are refinanced has been adopted. The main difference between what passed and what the Farmers' Union asked for is the rate of interest. We will get a lower rate in the next session of Congress if you farmers listening in who are not members of the Farmers' Union do your duty and get into the Farmers' Union.

There is no question, the influence of the Farmers' Union, together with some other organizations are completely responsible for the defeat of every effort to saddle on the poor of the country a sales tax. If this had been our total accomplishment it justifies all the efforts we put forth and gives us the right to ask those farmers who are not members of the Farmers' Union to come in with us. The sales tax would have meant a tax on an average farm family of $25 per year. Sure, we have a right to ask you to come into your class organization—the Farmers' Union.

Senator ELMER THOMAS of Oklahoma is a member of the Farmers' Union and has been for years. The amendments he drove into the farm relief bill are strictly the Farmers' Union national legislative program for inflation. The Thomas amendment for inflation provides for the Government's issuing noninterest bearing full legal-tender Treasury notes when it needs money instead of issuing interest-bearing bonds and asking the bankers to furnish the money for the Government. Another provision of the Thomas amendment is the revaluation of the gold dollar in which it may be reduced to the extent of half the number of grains of gold that now constitutes a dollar. Of course all these provisions are given to the President and to the Secretary of Agriculture as optional powers. They may or may not use them. I believe conditions will compel them to use them. Another amendment to the farm relief bill that no other organization has supported for the last 3 years except the Farmers' Union, is the Wheeler bill providing for the remonetization of silver. This is one of the very best provisions for inflation placed within the power of the President to use.

The Farmers' Union is unalterably opposed to war. We believe that big war preparations are a peace hazard. There is no question but that we have been a big influence in the reduction of appropriations for Army and Navy. For the first time in many years these appropriations have been reduced. In line with these reductions the President of the United States has issued a communication to 54 nations of the world that promises the beginning of a real world-wide peace movement.

You farmers listening in who are not members of your class organization, why not write E. E. Kennedy, national secretary of the Farmers' Union, Kankakee, Ill., and find out how you may get into your own class organization and help to bring about the fulfillment of the complete legislative program of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

I want you to know that the Farmers' Union has just been through a few battles. We have lost none. We have never been compelled to retreat. Every move has been a forward move. We also know that a war does not consist of 1, 3, or 4 battles. Wars have many battles. They sometimes last for years. This is a war. The Farmers' Union is the cooperative army. It is the army of unselfishness. We are at war with greed and avarice. We are right and because we are right we are going to win this war. We need recruits. You farmers listening in, come join this cooperative army of unselfishness, the Farmers' Union.

NATIONAL REMONETIZATION LEAGUE

The National Remonetization League is an organization with one specific purpose and that is the remonetization of silver as provided in the Wheeler bill, S. 70. Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, of Montana, author of the Wheeler bill, is president of this organization. Among a number of the officials of the organization is William Jennings Bryan, Jr.

The Farmers' Union is cooperating in every way with the National Remonetization League. I urge our members and those listening in to support this organization in every way possible.

The remonetization of silver is simply wiping out the crime of 1873. Every good citizen should be willing to assist in wiping out crime.

President Roosevelt is now clothed with the power of putting into effect the Wheeler bill. He can at any time restore to silver its function as money. He can put the United States on the bimetallic basis as it was when thieves went to the National Capitol and by stealth demonetized silver.

When you are working for the remonetization of silver you are asking for the same money that Washington used, for the same money that Jefferson used, for the same money that Jackson and Abraham Lincoln used. I would rather be on the side of Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln in this money matter than on the side of the now thoroughly discredited international bankers. These crooked bankers are opposed to the Wheeler bill.

Let the President of the United States know that you would like for him to remonetize silver at once.

COOPERATIVE BUSINESS

Mr. Farmer of the East, I want to talk to you about other activities of the Farmers' Union than legislation.

You come into my State, Oklahoma, today and this is what you will find. You will find some 20,000 farm families members of the Farmers' Union with cooperative institutions scattered over the State with a paid-up capital of over $4,000,000. You will find our adjusters for our property insurance have just come in from adjusting and paying a large number of windstorm losses. You will find the Oklahoma Farmers' Union carrying on a property insurance company for their members and their cooperative institutions with a combined business of over $40,000,000. You will find that they have operated for years on a premium of one half the old-line companies' rates. You will find that they have paid thousands of losses with not more than 3 or 4 lawsuits. You will find that they are much more prompt in the payment of losses than old-line companies. You will find the Farmers' Union of Oklahoma with its own office building in Oklahoma City in connection with the warehouse where they do a wholesale and car-lot business in the handling of things farmers need. You will find farmers bringing in their livestock to the stockyards, then driving over to the Farmers' Union warehouse and loading up building supplies, manufactured feeds of all kinds, furniture, stoves, farm implements, and hundreds of other things. Many times I have heard a farmer say, after loading his truck, "I have saved $50 on the things I have purchased here as compared with the prices in my home town." The wholesale houses admit that we are the only concern that can compete with the chain stores. You can go out over the State and find more than 150 cooperative grain elevators, produce and cream stations, cotton gins, and other business institutions that are strictly Farmers' Union. Right now our Farmers' Union sales department is delivering about 2,000,000 pounds of twine to our Farmers' Union institutions. We buy this and deliver it at such a low expense that our members buy at retail their binder twine at 6 cents a pound. This is just a little brief statement of what is going on in one State.

You could go into Kansas and find them operating their insurance and sales department on just as big a scale as Oklahoma. You can go into Nebraska and besides doing all these things you would find the pioneer in the cooperative livestock business. The Farmers' Union of Nebraska in 1917 established in Omaha, Nebr., the first cooperative commission house in the United States. Later they established such a company at St. Joseph, Mo., then Sioux City, Iowa. These three places, with the oldest one only a few months over 15 years old, has paid back in patronage dividends to Farmers' Union members more than $3,000,000. This is not bookkeeping dividends. This is actual cash. Today Kansas and other States have livestock commission firms and the total volume of business of these cooperative livestock commission companies is greater than all other cooperative livestock commission companies in the United States. They are operating without Government money and are a success.

The Farmers' Union is strictly a farmers' class organization. Membership is limited to farmers. When we want to go into business or legislation, State or National, we do not have to consult any other group. That is the reason we have been so successful in our undertakings.

OUR NAME

You will observe in our name, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, two suggested topics, education and cooperation. Of course, education precedes cooperation. There is no other Nation-wide farm organization in the United States that has established and practiced cooperation to the extent the Farmers' Union has. We believe cooperation to be the law of God. It means working together for the good of all. All betterment comes through cooperation. All protection comes through cooperation.

COOPERATIVE SHOES

To you new locals who have self-organized, let me remind you that a well-shod horse never slips. The Farmers' Union local must have on cooperative shoes or it is liable to slip. I mean by this, when a local is organized and does no cooperative business it is like an unshod horse, and I mean by slipping that your members will not pay up at the end of the year. My advice to you is to put on cooperative shoes at once. At every local meeting make arrangements to cooperatively buy the things you need and sell the things you produce. If you do this, you are well shod. Your members will not slip, neither will your local.

Remember, cooperation never fails. It is lack of cooperation that fails. You will hear some fellow say, "We tried cooperation, but it did not work." The trouble was they just tried, they did not really cooperate. Real cooperation is loyalty to your own institution. Loyalty is the first essential to the success of cooperation and disloyalty is the cause of 90 percent of the failures of cooperation.

Cooperative buying is needed just as badly as cooperative selling. We often hear farmers say the price of things they have to buy is of small difference to them. All they care about is what they get for the things they produce. This is a mistake.

I saw a letter recently written to a retail merchant from a wholesale shoe house in which they advised an immediate large purchase of shoes for the reason that the advance in the price of cotton justified an increase in the price of leather goods. The point I desire to impress upon you is this: The business world figures just how much the farmer will have to spend and then places the price on the things the farmer will have to buy sufficiently high to absorb all that he gets for his products. So if you are going to help yourselves you must arrange to do cooperative buying as well as cooperative selling.

LOCAL MEETINGS

Many times the members do not realize the value of meeting together. No organization can be effective or even exist very long where the members do not have regular meetings. In the first place it is necessary in order for them to think together. There is a wonderful power in thinking together. If six and a half million farmers, their wives, sons, and daughters were all members of the Farmers' Union, meeting in their locals at least twice a month, thinking the same thoughts, discussing the same subjects, no human could measure the effect of that cooperative thinking on the rest of the people of the Nation. If I were adept in the study of psychology I might be able to give this subject the consideration it deserves, but I can only touch the surface by simply calling your attention to the fact that there is a power in thought and especially in thinking together.

Another value of meeting together is that it is here you have an opportunity to cooperate in a business way. Those locals that never meet do very little cooperating in a business way and sooner or later members drop out and the local dies. Those locals who do meet regularly are almost continually cooperating in selling or buying, or both. They are the alive, wide-awake locals that never die.

OPPOSITION A BLESSING

To you new members east of the Mississippi River, and to you farmers who are not members, let me tell you of my experiences and observations, both of individuals and organizations in the matter of opposition both must meet. I have found in my own experience that opposition is absolutely necessary to success. I have found that organizations are just like persons in that regard. If you are doing anything worth while, opposition will develop. If a farmer organization is actually making and saving money to farmers, there will be plenty of opposition. But when you are right, enemies are more necessary to your success than friends. It is the opposing wind that makes the kite rise. The heavy blows of the blacksmith to the fire-tested iron make possible the completed, useful tools. The hurdles in the way of the athlete are the thing necessary to increase his speed and his jump. It is the cold north wind that makes the blood flow fast, quickens the pulse, and energizes and vitalizes both the body and mind. Your enemies are the north wind; they only make you stronger in the faith; their opposition develops your activity; they force you to arm yourself in unanswerable argument; they stimulate you to work overtime. Yes; all of the time. Your friends are the warm noonday sun that relaxes and enervates you and makes you lazy. They are an anesthetic that causes you to sleep overtime. So be sure you are right, then be thankful for your enemies and watch your friends.

APPEAL FOR MEMBERSHIP

You members of the Farmers' Union listening in, let me appeal to you to go forth from where you are listening in this moment more determined than ever to see that the farmers in your community, your county, and State are thoroughly organized into a class organization of their own. You farmers listening in, who are not members of the Farmers' Union, I urge, I beseech, I beg of you to write to our national secretary, E. E. Kennedy, Kankakee, Ill., and find out how you may organize a local of the Farmers' Union right there in your neighborhood. You need the Farmers' Union. The Farmers' Union needs you. Remember all other farm organizations have city chaperons. The Farmers' Union has no city chaperons. You farmers listening in who are not members of the Farmers' Union should self-organize. Let all of us work together. Let each of us do his part in establishing in these United States a permanent farmers' class organization with the numbers and the power to prevent the enemies of democracy from stealing from us that which our forefathers gave us in the sacrifice of their blood and tears. Let us prove ourselves worthy sons of the patriots of 1776, fully able to outwit and outgeneral the sons of the Tories of 1776.

In every war the farmers of this Nation have furnished more soldiers than any other class, and not only have furnished more soldiers but in every war have furnished a higher percentage of soldiers according to the number of farmers than any other class according to their number. In war we have been the backbone of the Army and the protector of our Nation. Let us, like men, assume that same position in time of peace and through our own good organization place ourselves in position where we can be the protector and defender of the land we love.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I call up at this time a resolution coming over from a previous day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator to the fact that that can be done only after the call of the calendar is completed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand the resolution to which the Senator from Colorado has reference is on the table, and comes over from a previous day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary clerk advises the Chair that it does not come over from a previous day. It was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when the resolution was presented by the able Senator from Colorado I objected because I thought it was an inappropriate occasion for its consideration. The resolution was left on the desk and never placed on the calendar. I made no objection to that procedure at that time. It must have come under the rule relating to resolutions coming over from a previous day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands from the parliamentary clerk that there is nothing coming over from the previous day but the Table Calendar. The resolution belongs on the Table Calendar, and can only come up after the calendar has been called under rule VIII.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire how the resolution was placed on the Table Calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By request of the Senator from Colorado when he introduced it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I had not understood that he made such a request.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The request will be withdrawn at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 15) extending to the whaling industry certain benefits granted under section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is necessarily absent, has objected on previous occasions to consideration of the joint resolution and asked that it go over.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator desire to make objection to its consideration at this time?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the calendar be called for unobjected bills only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will state the next order of business on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 682) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default on its obligations to the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ADVANCES TO RECLAMATION FUND

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 317) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make advances to the reclamation fund, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "necessary", to insert "not exceeding $5,000,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized and empowered to advance from funds made available by section 2 of the act of January 22, 1932 (47 Stat.L. 5), to the reclamation fund created by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat.L. 388), such sum or sums as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary, not exceeding $5,000,000, for the completion of projects or divisions of projects now under construction, or projects approved and authorized. Funds so advanced shall be repaid out of any receipts and accretions accruing to the reclamation fund within such time as may be fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, not exceeding 5 years from the date of advance, with interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum. Sums so advanced may be expended in the same way as other moneys in the reclamation fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator from California desire to have the bill considered at this time?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EVERGLADES NATIONAL PARK, FLA.

The bill (S. 324) to provide for the establishment of the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when title to all the lands within boundaries to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior within the area of approximately 2,000 square miles in the region of the Everglades of Dade, Monroe, and Collier Counties, in the State of Florida, recommended by said Secretary in his report to Congress of December 3, 1930, pursuant to the act of March 1, 1929 (45 Stat., pt. 1, 1443), shall have been vested in the United States, said lands shall be, and are hereby, established, dedicated, and set apart as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people and shall be known as the "Everglades National Park": Provided, That the United States shall not purchase by appropriation of public moneys any land within the aforesaid area, but such lands shall be secured by the United States only by public or private donation.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion and upon submission of evidence of title satisfactory to him, to accept on behalf of the United States title to the lands referred to in the previous section hereof as may be deemed by him necessary or desirable for national park purposes: Provided, That no land for said park shall be accepted until exclusive jurisdiction over the entire park area, in form satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, shall have been ceded by the State of Florida to the United States.

SEC. 3. The administration, protection, and development of the aforesaid park shall be exercised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the National Park Service, subject to the provisions of the act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535), entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes", as amended: Provided, That the provisions of the act approved June 10, 1920, known as the "Federal Water Power Act", shall not apply to this park: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to lessen any existing rights of the Seminole Indians which are not in conflict with the purposes for which the Everglades National Park is created.

SALES OF TIMBER ON KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION

The bill (S. 1513) to amend Public Act No. 435 of the Seventy-second Congress, relating to sales of timber on Indian land, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Oregon if he is familiar with the bill and what its purposes are?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the bill appertains to timber on Indian lands and Indian reservations of the Klamath Indians located in the southern part of Oregon. The timber is under contract for sale far above the present commercial value and none of it is being cut. It must be converted into lumber in order to give the Indians compensation upon which they may live. The bill permits the Secretary of the Interior to conform the price so it will be salable. It has the approval of the committee and it has the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, there has been a full-fledged scandal about the administration of the reservation of the Klamath Indians in Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. On the contrary, the Senator does not know anything of the kind. There has been no scandal. There have been charges against the administration which have now passed into history.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that not only have charges been made but proof has been offered showing beyond a shadow of controversy that those Indians, some 200 in number, have been looked after in the beginning by something like 58 officers and employees on the reservation, every one of them except three having a stenographer, having an automobile at the expense of the Indians; every one getting a per diem when he went from one part of the reservation to another; every one of them drawing a good salary out of the Indians' funds; every one of them standing together with the others.

The Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs at that time, whose name escapes my mind for the moment, testified that it ought not to be any concern of our committee, because the money came out of the Indians and did not come out of the Government. That was the statement which the then Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs made. In other words, some $250,000 of income which had come to the Indians was involved, and some $60,000 of it had been spent by those employees on the reservation, and the Indians got practically nothing that year. That may not be a scandal to some Senators, but to my mind it is a scandal. It is an indefensible thing. Every one of the officers on the reservation and those in charge of the Bureau boldly say that it ought not to be any matter of concern to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs because the funds by which those employees were paid big salaries, furnished automobiles, furnished homes, given a per diem in addition, came out of the Indians and did not come out of the Government. For that reason it seems to me somebody ought to think and speak for the Indians on this reservation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there have been rumors of that character. I think I know as much about the situation as does the Senator from Tennessee. The Indians at one time sold their timber at such huge profits that it caused them extravagantly to spend more money than they should. That was when the price of timber was high several years ago. The price level is now so low that unless arrangements can be made by which the Secretary of the Interior may sell the timber at its present market value, there will not be enough income to sustain the Indians on the reservation.

I have introduced the bill at the request of the Indians, represented by their tribal council held at Klamath Falls. They are in dire need of money to sustain them. The bill simply provides that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in whom the Senator has implicit confidence, may so arrange it that the timber will sell at the present market price in order to help the Indians.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, that timber is all under contract now. If the contractors who bought the timber at a price upon which the contractors and the Government both agreed, would simply carry out their contracts, the Indians would get a sufficient fund to sustain them, provided it is not all taken up by administrative expenses as it has been in the past. But the contractors want to get out of their contracts because timber has gone down since the contracts were made. The bill makes provision and gives the contractors a right to get out of their contract. But that is not all there is in the bill. It is not for the benefit of the Indians. It is for the benefit of the contractors. So far as I am concerned, I think the bill ought not to pass. I am opposed to it, and I shall object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection until I may make a statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. I withhold the objection momentarily.

Mr. STEIWER. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator which I think might cause him to withhold his objection permanently. It is true that the contractors would be benefited by the bill, provided the Indians themselves favor the modification of the contract, and provided the Commissioner of Indian Affairs reaches the conclusion that the modification ought to be made. I think from that the Senator from Tennessee said that he was assuming that if the bill is not passed, the contractor would proceed with the cutting of the timber and the Indians would, in any event, get the benefit of its sale.

Mr. McKELLAR. They will if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs simply does his duty, because he has the right to enforce the contract.

Mr. STEIWER. There is where the Senator is seriously in error. The trouble is that the timber companies, with one or two possible exceptions, are financially unable to continue the operation under the contracts. With few exceptions the bonds are not good for more than a fractional part of the losses which the contractors would sustain if they attempted to cut the timber and pay $8 for stumpage when the wholesale market in which they sell manufactured lumber is not very much in excess of that figure. It is utterly impossible for the contractors to go forward.

I want to say one thing further. The Senator knows that in the matter of expenditures on the reservation he and I have been in accord. I think I have always voted the same way the Senator from Tennessee has voted in the Appropriations Committee with reference to the matter of cutting down expenses on the Klamath Reservation. He will be interested to know that the current figures show a very different story from the old figures against which we used to complain. The automobiles are not so numerous now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEIWER. The 53 employees are not there now. The number has been cut down about 70 percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. The number of employees has been cut down from 58 to 27. All of them who are there still have their automobiles and still have their good salaries and their per diems, and still have their homes furnished.

Mr. STEIWER. That is not my information. Moreover, the delegate representing the Indians, who came here to protest against the expenditure, himself an Indian, has been placed in charge of that reservation and we may assume he will protest against extravagance. Still, moreover, the Indians recently held a tribal meeting upon the reservation. I am told that at that meeting there was no white man present. It was a meeting within the last 10 days at which, by an overwhelming vote, the Indians of the Klamath Reservation endorsed the bill.

Those Indians are not stupid. Many of them are well educated and are very intelligent people. They know what the old abuses were. They know what corrections have been made. They know what curtailments have been provided for their benefit. They know the financial condition of the contractors; they know the price of stumpage; and they know there is going to be no revenue for them unless some remedial legislation is enacted. It seems to me that a high-class people like the Klamath Indians ought to have some voice in the management of their own business. I can assure the Senator that an examination of the new figures will show to him such a great improvement in those conditions that I think he will be entirely satisfied with the situation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point certain sheets showing the reductions in pay roll and other expense upon the Klamath Indian Reservation.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Estimate of Indian Bureau based on fiscal appropriation and past expenditures.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will read what this bill provides. It proposes to amend the existing law by striking out of the first section thereof the following words:

Provided, That the prices are not reduced below the basic sale prices.

It is proposed, therefore, to reduce the prices below the basic sale prices; that is, below the prices for which other people are selling lumber.

Mr. STEIWER. No; below the basic sale prices in the contracts. No Klamath Indian stumpage will be sold below the market at which other people sell.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not say that. It says, "below the basic sale prices"; not "below the contract sale prices."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that refers to the basic sale prices in the contracts.

Mr. STEIWER. In the contracts, of course.

Mr. McKELLAR. This provision does not so provide.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the Senator has not before him the act which this bill proposes to amend. If he had, it would be perfectly apparent that this bill refers to nothing but the basic prices in the contracts.

If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, if he has the floor, may I say to the Senator from Tennessee that I share with him the desire which he manifests to protect the rights of the Indians in this situation; but may I point out to the Senator that when Public Act No. 435 was passed the same representative of the Klamath Indians was before the committee and insisted that the phraseology now proposed to be stricken out should be in the bill. After the act was passed, after returning to the reservation, and after studying the full effect of that phraseology, my information is that the Indians themselves, acting entirely upon their own motion, came to the unanimous conclusion that it was in the interest of the tribe itself to have that phraseology taken from the bill, for the simple reason that it is impossible for these companies to operate under the contracts entered into prior to the depression.

Now, as I understand, both the Department and the representative of the Indians in tribal council have recognized that unless this phraseology is taken out of the act passed at the last session of Congress there will be no operations whatsoever, or they will be upon such a limited scale that the revenues to the Indians will be greatly diminished.

For whatever it may be worth, may I say to the Senator from Tennessee that I am convinced, from such information as I have, both from the Department and from the representatives of the Klamath Indians—a very intelligent tribe—that their interests will be best served by the enactment of this amendatory bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Of course, my only interest in this matter is the interest of the Indians.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The contractors who have bought this lumber are taking it out in accordance with the contract, cutting it, sawing it, and sending it out.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. They give the Government a bond——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has the floor, and his time under the rule has expired.

Mr. LONG. Can we not have a little bit better order in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the former Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. FRAZIER] and others on the committee have stated that this bill is in the interest of the Indians—I cannot see how it is possible—but, in view of their statements, since they are on the Indian Affairs Committee, I am not going to object. I really think, however, that this is a bad bill and that it is in the interest of the contractors and not in the interest of the Indians.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Act No. 435 of the Seventy-second Congress entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to modify the terms of existing contracts for the sale of timber on Indian lands when it is in the interest of the Indians so to do" is hereby amended by striking from the first section thereof the words "Provided, That the prices are not reduced below the basic sale prices."

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SYSTEM

The bill (S. 510) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have several amendments which I should like to offer to this bill. I suggest that it go over.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that the Senate on two occasions has approved this legislation, and I am informed that the Senator from Utah himself supported it heretofore. In view of that fact, I did not think there would be any need for further discussion.

The bill simply provides for a coordinated system of employment exchanges between the States and the Federal Government. I may say that the President himself is strongly in favor of the legislation, and recognizes, particularly at this time, the need of such a system. We are without any coordinated system of public employment exchanges; and with the legislation that is about to come, which will require the reassembling of workers in different sections of the country, the work will be very much impeded, if not frustrated, if we have not a system of employment exchanges of this character.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is not this the bill that passed at the previous session?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes. As a matter of fact, the Senate passed upon it twice, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is my recollection.

Mr. WAGNER. I understood that it was universally accepted. The committee reported it unanimously.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say for the committee that we had an extended hearing on this bill this year, as we have had before; and by unanimous vote of the committee its passage was recommended. I hope it may be passed now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in a conversation which I had some time ago with the Secretary of Labor, I was informed that her intention was to utilize more and more the State organizations.

Mr. COPELAND. This bill provides, may I say to the Senator, for the absolute utilization of the State organizations.

Mr. KING. I thought this bill was not in harmony with the views of the Secretary of Labor.
